

Aristotle
On Poetics

Translated by Seth Benardete and Michael Davis

With an introduction by Michael Davis

St. Augustine's Press
South Bend, Indiana
2002

Copyright © 2002 by Seth Benardete and Michael Davis

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior permission of St. Augustine's Press.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 09 08 07 06 05 04 03 02

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data Aristotle.

[Poetics. English]

Aristotle's On poetics / translated by Seth Benardete and Michael Davis with an introduction by Michael Davis.

p. cm.

Includes index.

ISBN 1-58731-025-2 (hardcover : alk. paper) – ISBN

1-58731-026-0 (pbk. : alk. paper)

1. Poetry – Early works to 1800. 2. Aesthetics – Early works to 1800. I. Title: On poetics. II. Benardete, Seth.

III. Davis, Michael, 1947- IV. Title.

PN1040.A513 2001

808.2 – dc21

2001005879

∞ The paper used in this publication meets the minimum requirements of the International Organisation for Standardization (ISO) – Paper for documents – Requirements for permanence – ISO 9706: 1994.

Printed in the Czech Republic by Newton Printing Ltd. www.newtonprinting.com

Contents

Preface	vi
Introduction	xi
On Poetics	1
Appendices
1. References to On Poetics in Other Texts of Aristotle	73
2. Aristotle On the Parts of Animals 644b22–645a30	76
3. Aristotle Rhetoric (various)	78
4. Pseudo-Aristotle Problemata	84
5. Aristotle Politics (various)	86
6. Aristotle Nicomachean Ethics (various)	87
Indexes
Index of Proper Names and Titles	90
Word Index	94

Preface

Aristotle's On Poetics has been widely read, and ^{deservedly} deservedly so, simply as a treatise on tragedy. It is telling that the book that provides a historical account of the development of tragedy as the perfection of poetry and yet praises the oldest of the poets as the best of the poets should at once stand at the beginning of the history of literary criticism and be the greatest work in the tradition it inaugurates. Since, as one might expect, there have been countless translations of On Poetics, one might legitimately wonder what justifies yet another. We began this translation with the intention of providing a useful complement to *The Poetry of Philosophy: [On Aristotle's Poetics, the argument of which is meant to establish that On Poetics, while certainly about tragedy, has a concern that extends beyond poetry to the very structure of the human soul in its relation to what is.]* Since this is not immediately apparent, excavating the argument of On Poetics proves to require attending not only to what is said on the surface but also to the various puzzles, questions, and peculiarities that emerge only on the level of how Aristotle says what he says and thereby lead one to revise and deepen one's initial understanding of the intent of the argument. It is perhaps not altogether shocking that someone who devotes such attention to how tragedy ought to be composed should be concerned as well with the how of his own writing. With its issues framed in this way, On Poetics turns out to be a rather beautiful piece of literature in its own right.

¹ This is possible because in dealing with what cannot be otherwise, tragedy reflects the necessity of the impossible both in the stories it tells and in its manner of telling them.

Naturally how one understands Aristotle's manner of writing in On Poetics has consequences for how one will translate him. If the book is not properly speaking a writing at all but a collection of lecture notes the intention of which, while generally quite clear, is occasionally dark owing to Aristotle's infelicitous choice of words, then a translator will have as his task rendering the sense of what is obvious and striving to clarify what Aristotle has left obscure. If, on the other hand, On Poetics is an artful composition, a translator will seek to preserve interesting ambiguities, translate Greek terms consistently with a single word as much as is compatible with intelligible English so as to preserve allusions in the text that suggest otherwise odd but perhaps fruitful comparisons, (and not change sentence structures gratuitously.) Now, even if On Poetics were simply a collection of notes, as long as this sort of fastidiousness results in readable English, nothing would be sacrificed. And if On Poetics is something more than that, of course, a great deal would be gained from translating scrupulously. Accordingly it seems a wager in the spirit of Pascal to translate On Poetics as literally as possible, and we have endeavored to do so in this spirit.

The choice of crucial terms for a translation that strives to be literal is frequently difficult, and necessarily sometimes impossible. Muthos clearly means plot, and everyone translates it this way. However, before Aristotle appropriates it for On Poetics and uses it in a rather technical way to refer to the plot of a drama or of an epic poem, insofar as muthos refers to stories, they are always either about the gods or have in some way a divine origin. In no other work of Aristotle is muthos used to mean plot. His very special use of the word thus calls our attention to the marked absence of the question of the gods in On Poetics, an absence very peculiar given the role of the gods in the extant tragedies.² In appropriating for a rational account a term that ordinarily involves the divine, Aristotle cannot simply be denying the import of the gods for tragedy as it had existed historically. Is it possible, then, that he means to provide in On Poetics an account of the deeper function of which the presence of the gods in particular tragedies is merely the surface manifestation? That is, is Aristotle's long treatment of the centrality of plot for tragedy meant to be connected to the centrality of the sacred in human life as providing a limit (beyond which one cannot go and remain human?) We have chosen the less technical "story" as a translation of muthos and added a note explaining our choice in the hope of keeping open issues of this kind; after Aristotle "plot" falls perhaps too easily for us into the category of a part of fiction. In On Poetics, as in his other works, Aristotle frequently uses ordinary words in rather exotic ways, coins words, or resuscitates words dying out of the language. He is such a powerful thinker that we who come after him have tended to take these departures from the ordinary language for granted. To preserve Aristotle's original meaning it is sometimes necessary to avoid the technical vocabulary he originates (e.g., we have rendered katharsis as "cleansing") or to transliterate certain key terms (e.g., poiësis) so as to avoid prematurely narrowing their meanings. Many of the notes to the text are for the purpose of elucidating ambiguities of this kind.

² No less peculiar is the suppression of the political as an issue. The word polis occurs only twice in On Poetics and in rather insignificant contexts.

This edition of On Poetics differs from others as well in providing in the notes to the text and in the appendices translations of passages found elsewhere in Aristotle's works, as well as in those of other ancient authors that prove useful in thinking through the argument of On Poetics both in terms of its treatment of tragedy and in terms of its broader concerns. It is our hope that by following the connections Aristotle plots between On Poetics and his other works readers will begin to appreciate the centrality of this little book for his thought on the whole.

The text of Aristotle's On Poetics rests primarily on two Greek manuscripts and translations, one in Arabic and two in Latin.

Accordingly, the text is at times corrupt for several lines, and extensive interpolations have been suspected. Many scholars have contributed to the interpretation and/or correction of On Poetics. Besides the various editions of Butcher, Bywater, Else, Gudeman, Kassel, and Lucas, we wish to single out Johannes Vahlen's Beiträge zu Aristoteles' Poetik (Leipzig-Berlin 1914). We wish also to thank Ronna Burger for reading through the whole translation with care and for making numerous valuable suggestions for its improvement. An earlier version of this translation was used in Michael Davis's course on Greek Tragedy at Sarah Lawrence College; we thank his students for noticing errors and pointing out passages that were unnecessarily unclear.

* * * * *

In the autumn of 2001, Seth Benardete took ill; he died on November 14. During the weeks before his death we worked together on the page proofs of the translation of On Poetics and made the few corrections that were necessary. At the time I did not know that this would be the final stage of an ongoing conversation that lasted for over twenty years. Benardete's mastery of Greek and Latin texts was legendary. He was, to be sure, a great scholar – perhaps the ablest classicist of his generation – but scholarship was never his primary concern. For Benardete, to read a book meant finally to look past it to the world it describes – to philosophize. Seth Benardete was an extraordinary man from whom it was my great privilege and delight to learn. His friendship was a gift beyond measure.

Introduction

Of Aristotle's writings none has had more staying power than On Poetics. It has been commented on by scholars too numerous to name and even more impressively by the likes of Averroes and Avicenna (even though they seem to have had at best a very unclear idea of what a tragedy was¹), Racine and Corneille, Lessing and Goethe, Milton and Samuel Johnson.² Yet all this interest seems rather queer given the subject matter of the book. On Poetics is about tragedy.³ But Greek tragedy is very unlike our drama. To mention only a few of its exotic characteristics, it is performed by at most three actors playing multiple roles, wearing masks, accompanied by a chorus that is both a character in the play and a spectator of it, alternating between song and dialogue, before audiences of up to 30,000 people. The chorus sings using one dialect and speaks in another. The very complicated poetic meter is based not on stress but on the length of syllables. Since the language was accented tonally, one would think singing in Greek would be particularly difficult to understand. How were the tones of the individual words combined with the tones of the tunes? So by our standards it was strange. But did it not endure for a long time? Not really – the great age of Greek tragedy lasts for less than one hundred years. In this it seems much less impressive than the novel. Greek tragedy pretty much spans the life of one man – Sophocles (and, curiously enough, also the life of Athenian democracy). But was it not at least very widespread? Again, not really – it was imitated of course, but tragedy is predominantly an Athenian phenomenon, restricted in large measure to the area of Greece called Attica – hence Attic tragedy. All of the Greek plays we now possess were originally performed in one theater – the theater of Dionysus on the slope of the Acropolis. Why then should we be concerned with a book written 2400 years ago about a literary form practiced for only a hundred years in a single theater in a city more or less the size of Peoria? That On Poetics is traditionally taken to be an important book, then, may be taken for granted; why this should be the case, however, is not so clear.

¹ Although they do not seem to have possessed any tragedies, their commentaries are filled with interesting remarks. Still, Aristotle's account alone was not enough for Avicenna to recognize that tragedy was more than "the praise meant for a living or dead person."

² See Averroes, Averroes' Middle Commentary on Aristotle's Poetics, C. Butterworth, trans. (South Bend, Ind.: St. Augustine's Press, 2000); Dahiyat, I.M., Avicenna's Commentary on the Poetics of Aristotle: A Critical Study with an Annotated Translation (Leyden: Brill, 1974); Corneille, Pierre, "Discours de la Tragédie" in Théâtre complet, vol. 1 (Paris: Garnier, 1971), 33-56; Racine, Jean, Preface to Phèdre, (Paris: Larousse, 1965); Lessing, G.E., Hamburgische Dramaturgie, Nrs. 73-83 in Werke, vols. 6-7 (Leipzig: Bibliographische Institut, 1911); Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von, Nachlese zu Aristotelische Poetik in Goethe the Critic, introduction and notes by G.F. Semnos, revised and completed by C.V. Bock (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1960), 60-63; Milton, John, Preface to Samson Agonistes in Poetical Works (New York: American News Company, no date); and Boswell, James, Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1934).

³ The general, but not universal, view is that there were originally two books to On Poetics, one on tragedy and a second on comedy. In our text, recovered about 1500, there is no account of comedy.

The first words, and traditional title, of the On Poetics are peri poiêtikês – on the art of whatever it is that the verb poiein means. Ordinarily poiein would mean “to do,” especially in the sense of “to make.” It is the French faire or the German machen. Then it gets a narrower meaning as well – to make poetry. So peri poiêtikês means “on the art of poetry.” Aristotle will argue that tragedy is paradigmatic for poetry, and so the book about poetry can be primarily about its most perfect manifestation. At the same time there is considerably more at stake. At the end of his discussion of the historical origins of comedy and tragedy, Aristotle remarks that the Dorians lay claim (antipoiontai) to both, citing their names as signs.

And they say they name doing [poiein] dran, but that the Athenians name it prattein. (1448b1-2)

While this seems scarcely more than a footnote, in the context of On Poetics Aristotle has invited us to consider poiein and prattein synonyms. Should we accept his invitation we would have to retranslate the title of Aristotle's most frequently read little book. Peri Poiêtikês would mean On the Art of Action. Actors and acting would have something to do with action; poetry would somehow be at the center of human life.

Circumstantial evidence favors such a view of On Poetics. If all human action seems to aim at some good, and if the existence of instrumental goods points toward a good for the sake of which we choose all the others, and if there is a science of this highest good, and if as Aristotle says this is political science, or politikê (Nicomachean Ethics 1094a), then one would expect poiêtikê and politikê to be very closely linked. They are. Aristotle's Politics ends with an account of music, and especially poetry, as both the means for educating men to be good citizens and the goal for which they are educated.

What all of this might mean becomes somewhat clearer in Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics. In Book 3, courage or manliness (andreia) is said to be the proper mean with regard to the passions fear and confidence. However since fear can be understood as an anticipation (a prosdokia or foreseeing) of bad things generally, lest courage be thought somehow equivalent to all of virtue, the particular fear with which it deals must be specified. As the most terrible fear is of death, this must be what concerns courage – but not all death. Courage comes into play where it is possible for us to exercise choice. It is therefore most of all concerned with facing death in war.

To make this point Aristotle compares drowning at sea with fighting a battle. The comparison recalls Iliad Book 21 where Achilles fights with a river – called Xanthus by the gods and by us, and Scamander by Achilles and the Trojans. Achilles laments the possibility that he might die in this ignominious way; to us who are aware that he is fighting with a god, his fate does not look so disgraceful. Aristotle knows, of course, that it is possible to be courageous in a hurricane, but thinks such courage is understood metaphorically. The paradigm is always fighting in battle. The account of the specific moral virtues, therefore, begins with courage because courage is a model for how to deal with all fear understood as prosdokia of the bad, and so for how to deal with the bad generally. Aristotle focuses on a situation in which we have a choice so as to provide a model for behaving always as though we had a choice. Accordingly, Achilles is not simply the most courageous but the model for virtue altogether. |

The hardest problem for Aristotle's account of courage is that, while the moral virtues are supposed to make us happy, courage is frequently rather unpleasant and can easily make us dead. In fact the virtue (one usually thinks of as attached to deeds of daring) has nothing to do with skill in killing and is almost exclusively concerned with the appropriate attitude toward dying. Why, then, does the brave man risk his life? Aristotle says it is for the sake of the kalon – the noble or beautiful. But this kalon end is clearly not present in the activity itself. Neither killing nor being killed is by itself beautiful. We must look beyond the dead bodies fouling the Scamander to see Achilles' devotion to the kalon. The brave man, presenting an image to himself of his action as completed, looks at his deed as others will look at it, and so reaps the benefits of honor even before it has been granted. The present action becomes kalon insofar as it is made complete through reflection or imagination. The brave, therefore, do what they do not because it is good, but because they can say "it is good." This is what the kalon means.

The highest of the spurious forms of courage is political courage; its goal is honor. For examples Aristotle quotes Hector and Diomedes worrying about what will be said of them if they do not fight. But just what is it that differentiates this from acting "for the sake of the kalon?" If courage always means courage in war, then it will always manifest itself in a political context. Cities make war; individual men do not. But if courage is a virtue, it ought to be something that transcends any particular polis. This is just the problem of Achilles. Apart from the polis he cannot show his virtue, but once he returns to the fighting his motives are necessarily obscure. Does he return for the sake of Patroklos, of the Greeks, of honor, of immortality? Andreia is in principle invisible, for one cannot see it apart from a political context, which is to say apart from the ulterior motives for action that are attributed to the political man.

The most ^(startling) thing about the account of courage in the Nicomachean Ethics is that Aristotle uses almost exclusively fictional examples — Achilles, Hector, Diomedes, etc. Without poetry there is virtually no possibility of seeing that element that makes courage what it is. The brave man does not risk his life out of a greater fear, or shame, or confidence owing to ^(superior) superior experience. And yet from the act itself it is impossible to tell the difference between these spurious forms of courage and the real thing. We need the whole story, and only poetry gives it to us. Poetry lets us see inside men so that we can celebrate their devotion to the kalon. This points us back to the earlier account of the metaphorical character of courage in a storm at sea. In a way, all courage is metaphorical. Even Achilles is playing a role; he knows his fate, and is therefore the paradigm of the courageous man; like all brave men, he wants "to die like Achilles." Poetry makes it possible to experience our action as whole before it is whole. This wholeness then becomes a part of the experience itself. Or rather, since the conjunction does not really occur temporally, poetry constitutes the experience. In the case of courage, what would be essentially painful is transformed into something "pleasant."⁴ And insofar as courage represents all moral virtue here, poetry would be the necessary condition for moral virtue generally. That we can contemplate the possibility of our own deaths is what makes it possible for us to attempt to fashion our lives as wholes, but as we never really experience our lives as wholes, this contemplation is a sort of fiction. It is poetic.

One can go one step further. Aristotle begins On Poetics by addressing two apparently different issues – the eidê of poetry and their powers and how to put a poem together out of its parts. Aristotle begins On Poetics in the following way:

Concerning poetics, both itself and its kinds [eidê], what particular power each has, and how stories [muthoi] should be put together if the poiêsis [poetry, making, thing made] is to be beautiful, and further from how many and from what sort of proper parts it is, and likewise also concerning whatever else belongs to the same inquiry, let us speak, beginning according to nature first from the first things. Now epic poetry [epopoia] and the making [poiêsis] of tragedy, and further comedy and the art of making dithyrambs [dithyrambopoiêtikê], and most of the art of the flute and of the cithara are all in general imitations. ↓

Aristotle is conducting a class at once in fiction writing and in literary criticism; his subject, poiêsis, is both the making and the thing made. An account of the art of making involves an analysis – a taking apart – of how things are put together (of course the pieces out of which something is put together are not necessarily the same as the pieces of our understanding of how it is put together).

⁴ See On Poetics 1448b10–20.

Directly after the methodological remark in which he announces his intention to begin from the first things, Aristotle lists various forms of imitation. Presumably imitations are the first things from which Aristotle will make his beginning. But as always derivative from what they imitate, they are queer beginning points. For poetry the first things apparently are second things.

Insofar as all human action is always already an imitation of action, it is in its very nature poetic. This places the beginning of Aristotle's famous definition of tragedy – that tragedy is an imitation of action – in a new light.⁵ On Poetics is about two things: poiêsis understood as poetry, or imitation of action, and poiêsis understood as action, which is also imitation of action. It is the distinctive feature of human action, that whenever we choose what to do, we imagine an action for ourselves as though we were inspecting it from the outside. Intentions are nothing more than imagined actions, internalizings of the external. All action is therefore imitation of action; it is poetic.

However plausible this connection between poetry and action, it does seem funny for tragedy to serve as the model for all human action. A full account of what we are to make of the turn to tragedy would require an interpretation of the whole of On Poetics.⁶ Fortunately there is a shortcut which hints at what is at stake. The two meanings of poiêsis – doing and poetry – are related much as talking and singing, walking and dancing, acting and acting. Human doing is double; to overstate the matter, it has a self-conscious part and an unself-conscious part. We are rational animals. Poetry, connected to the self-conscious character of action, at the same time manifests the doubleness of human action within itself. Aristotle turns to drama because, to a degree even greater than narrative poetry, it reflects the distinction between doing and looking at doing – between acting and reflecting. On the one hand drama must attempt to convince its audience of the reality of its action; on the other hand it must always remain acting – actors always imply spectators. Or, as George Burns once said “The most important thing about acting is honesty; if you can fake that you’ve got it made.”

⁵ See On Poetics 1449b24–28.

⁶ I have attempted an interpretation of this kind in The Poetry of Philosophy: On Aristotle's Poetics (South Bend, Indiana: St. Augustine's Press, 1999).

Tragedy is the highest form of poetry because it most embodies this doubleness. Now “story is the first principle and like the soul of tragedy” (1450a38–39);⁷ the two principles governing it – the likely and the necessary – point back to the distinction between the perspective of the actor and that of the spectator. An action within a play must seem to have consequences which are likely to the character doing them and necessary to the spectator watching them. By virtue of its structure, a tragic story accentuates the tension between spectator and actor. The best tragedies involve what Aristotle calls

⁷ In On Poetics, as in Greek tragedy itself, the relation between story and character is deeply puzzling. Just as we do not, and are not at first meant to, understand why the Oedipus who is a wise and good king, even if he has a tendency to anger quickly, should be the man who kills his father and sleeps with his mother, we do not understand why for Aristotle story so far exceeds character in importance among the parts of tragedy. A full account of this excess would be a long story – perhaps the story of On Poetics as a whole. Suffice it to say here that character stands to story as the two parts of mimêsis – emulation and representation – stand to one another. Tragedy makes character, otherwise invisible, show itself externally; a story reveals a soul to us in such a way as to allow us to be able to say, “That’s him!” That there is something artificial about the total agreement of story and character is clear from the Nicomachean Ethics, where the reverse movement must occur. We act for the sake of the good, the final good being happiness. But happiness requires that we take into account the story of our lives as wholes, something we are able to do neither while we live nor should there be a life after death. Accordingly, character substitutes for this inability to grasp our lives as wholes. The substitution, however, is not altogether effective since human happiness is not assured by being virtuous but depends as well on chance.

reversal (peripateia) and recognition (anagnôrisis). They are so to speak the soul of story. || Now, if poetry is ^[περιειρημική] paradigmatic for action, and drama for poetry⁸ – and if tragedy is the most complete form of drama, story the soul of tragedy, and reversal and recognition the core of a story – then by looking at Aristotle's treatment of recognition and reversal, we ought to be able to learn something about why tragedy is singled out as the model for human action.

Reversal is defined in Chapter 11 of On Poetics.

What has been spoken of as change into the contrary of the things being done is reversal and this too, just as we say, according to the likely or necessary.
(1452a22–24)

Aristotle's example is from Oedipus Tyrannus. A messenger has just come from Corinth with the "good news" that the king, Polybus, whom Oedipus believes to be his father, has died. Oedipus expresses some doubts about returning as the ^[στοιχίαι] oracle had also concerned his relations with his mother, and Merope, Polybus's wife, is still alive. This messenger, never given a name (or in Greek even a pronoun) by Aristotle, on his coming, in supposing that he was going to cheer Oedipus and release him from the fear regarding

⁸ That drama, as imitation of action, is the paradigm for all poetry is evident if one begins with Hesiod's claim that we know the muses "speak many lies like the truth" (Theogony 27). By presenting an alternative to the real as real, all poetry in saying what is not true has as its nature to conceal the true nature of the poet who created it. Drama, then, by making the poet invisible in its imitation of action is in a way poetry at its most pure. This vanishing from view of the poet goes together with the necessity that there be a viewing of action. See 1449b31: "Since they do [poiontai] the imitation by acting [prattontes], the ordered arrangement of the opsis [seeing, spectacle] would in the first place be of necessity some proper part of tragedy."

his mother, once he had made it clear who he was, he did [epoiêsen] the contrary. (1452a25-26)

The "he" is ambiguous here. It could apply to Oedipus, and it could apply to the messenger. But as disclosing Oedipus' identity proves to require disclosing the messenger's identity, the ambiguity seems to make no difference. In either case the good news proves bad. Intending to free Oedipus from the fear of parricide and incest, the messenger reveals that it was he who had brought the baby Oedipus to Polybus and Merope. The result is "a change into the contrary."

Now, it is clear that reversal involves some violation of expectation. But whose? Since the reversal need not coincide with any recognition within the play, the expectations cannot be those of characters in the play. [The Oedipus would not be dramatically affected were the messenger to leave before he discovered that his good news backfired.] At the same time, since the turn of events involves not so much a change as a reinterpretation of what has already occurred, some recognition seems necessary. Reversal must, therefore, be our recognition as an audience that what we thought to be is not what we thought it to be.

The account of recognition begins with a reference to its etymology:

Recognition [anagnôrisis], on the other hand, just as the name signifies, is a change from ignorance [agnoia] to knowledge [gnôsis], whether toward friendship or enmity of those whose relation to good or ill fortune has already been defined. (1152a29-32)

Recognition as an-agnorisis, is a privation of ignorance. But might we not understand its etymology as ana-gnorisis – knowing back or re-cognizing? As the very same syllables give us two quite different etymologies, it is not so obvious what "the name signifies." When this sort of ambiguity arises within a play, the conditions are present for recognition.⁹ A prior confusion is discovered in a way that alters the action of the play. Recognition is thus the awareness within the play, i.e., of a character, which parallels the audience's awareness of a reversal.

Recognition is most beautiful when it coincides with reversal – when the discovery within the play comes to be together with the discovery outside the play.¹⁰ Aristotle alludes to the recognition “most characteristic of story and most characteristic of action” as “the one previously mentioned” but more literally as “the one having been said” (1452a36–38). Now, presumably this means the most beautiful kind, i.e., where recognition and reversal coincide. At the same time, certain recognitions occur when a character comes to understand the significance of things that he has previously said. Oedipus does this sort of thing all the time. He promises to pursue the murderer of Laius as though Laius were his father (264–266). And he begins Oedipus Tyrannus by addressing those assembled around him as tekna Kadmou – children of Cadmus. Oedipus treats them as though they were his children; he does not realize that he too is a child of Cadmus, that those who, under his care as king, may be like children are also his brothers and sisters, his fellow citizens. For Oedipus, really recognizing who he is would involve discovering the significance of “what has been said.” The beauty of Aristotle's claim that the best recognition is “the one having been said” is that it is an example of itself.

A plot in which events simply followed one another predictably, i.e., in which the likely turned out to be the necessary, in which, for example, an army of superior strength attacked an enemy and won, would contain pathos (suffering or undergoing) but not reversal or recognition. Reversal makes an audience reflect on the necessity of action that at first seems unlikely, for example, that Deianira's attempt to make Herakles love her should end by killing him. Recognition introduces inference into the play so that reflection on the likelihood and necessity of the action becomes a part of the action and so has further consequences within the play itself. The turning point in Oedipus Tyrannus is Oedipus' discovery of who he is.¹¹ This sort of action in which coming to knowledge is decisive is, not surprisingly, especially revealing of the rational animal.

⁹ Consider Heracles' reinterpretation of the meaning of Zeus's promise that he would not die at the hands of anything living (Trachiniae 1157–78) – he first takes it to mean he will not die, but later understands it to mean he will be killed by the poison from the blood of the dead centaur Nessus.

¹⁰ It is worth noting that Aristotle does not say that the discovery is the same discovery.

If a story requires a change of fortune, and the best change involves the coincidence of reversal and recognition, in which direction ought the change to occur? It would be miarou – polluted or disgusting – were a man who is epieikês (sound) to move from good to bad fortune. In Nicomachean Ethics Book 5, Aristotle gives an account of epieikeia as a virtue more just than justice because correcting the necessary imprecision of law as general. The epieikês characteristically demands less than his share because he recognizes that justice does not prevail in the world. Epieikeia is therefore morality which is at the same time critical of moral idealism.¹² To show a man with such moderate expectations moving from good to ill fortune would be shocking. On the other hand, to show the wicked moving from bad to good fortune would arouse neither pity nor fear but righteous indignation. Tragedy is apparently not meant to cause utter despair of goodness in the world. Nor is it especially tragic to show the fortunes of the villainous change from good to bad. Such a plot might encourage philanthropeia – a sense of solidarity with other men – insofar as justice prevails, but it would result neither in pity (the villain gets what he deserves) nor in fear (the one who suffers is not like us). Tragedy, then, does not simply support morality and subverts moral naivete. Accordingly, Aristotle is silent about the plot in which the good man's fortune alters from ill to good. That tragedy is no simple morality play is signaled by a change in Aristotle's language. The "good" man – previously spoudaios or of stature (1448a2) – now becomes the epieikês – the sound man who is aware of the impossibility of perfect justice.

¹¹ It is surely no accident that the "moment" at which Oedipus learns "who he is" should be so fuzzy. Directly after the messenger tells him he is not the son of Polybus, Oedipus seems as concerned that Jocasta will think him ill born as he is that he is really the son of Laius (1062–63).

¹² See Burger, Ronna, "Ethical Reflection and Righteous Indignation: Nemesis in the Nicomachean Ethics," in Essays in Ancient Greek Philosophy IV: Aristotle's Ethics, edited by John Anton and Anthony Preus (Albany: SUNY Press, 1991), 130–34.

What remains then is what lies in between the epieikês and the bad man.

He who is distinguished neither by virtue and justice nor changing to bad fortune on account of vice and wickedness is of this sort, but one who changes on account of some mistake and is one of those in great repute and of good fortune such as Oedipus, Thyestes, and notable men of families of this sort. (1453a7–12)

The subjects of tragedy are those who are thought to be great. Their repute (doxa) is a question of opinion (doxa). That their "mistake" becomes a "great mistake" at 1453a16 has to do with the greatness of their repute in its connection to the rigidity of ordinary opinion. Their mistake has to do with being too little aware of the fuzziness of moral principles – too little epieikês. In one way such men are not virtuous; in another they are too virtuous.¹³

¹³ This is borne out by Aristotle's examples – Alcmeon and Orestes killed their mothers, but to avenge their fathers; Oedipus seeks to become master of his own fate, but to avoid the necessity to kill his father and marry his mother; Meleager is killed by his mother after accidentally killing his

According to Chapter 13 the change in plot must move from good to bad fortune. Curiously Aristotle seems to reverse himself in the following chapter. As actions may be done with or without knowledge, there are four possibilities for the action in tragedy. A character may intend to do something knowing what he is doing, but because of some accident not do it – this is not really drama. A character may intend to do something knowing what he is doing and do it – this is the case of Medea. A character may do something without intending to have done it and then discover what he has done – this is the case of Oedipus. Finally, a character may intend to do something, discover that he did not really know what he was doing and not do it – this is the case of Iphigeneia. Aristotle calls the last the best (1454a4). But how can it be best for Iphigeneia not to kill her brother, that is, for the play to have a happy ending, when tragedy requires a change from good to bad fortune?

Aristotle's language here is revealing. What the ancients did (epoioun) as well as what Euripides did (epoiesen) in the Medea was to make the doing (praxai) come to be with knowledge. Sophocles makes Oedipus do (praxai) terrible things in ignorance and then discover it. The "best" form is characterized as intending to do (poiein) and then, discovering, not to do (poiesai) it. Now, up to this point Aristotle had been using poiein to refer to the activity of the poet and prattein to apply to the activity of the character. Leaving this distinction intact, what is best would not be an action within the play but rather the action of the poet.

Let us see if we can pull some of the strands together. Reversal is an event in a play which leads the spectator to reflect on the events of the play. Recognition introduces this sort of reflection into the play as a piece of the action. By introducing the epieikês uncles; Thyestes, brother of Atreus, seduced Atreus's wife, and, to punish him, Atreus feeds him his children; Telephon is punished for accidentally killing his uncles. These cases seem to point to conflicting moral issues which do not admit of straightforward solution.

Aristotle pointed to a kind of virtue, the highest kind, which is only possible as a reflection on the imperfection of virtue more conventionally understood. But why is this highest man not the subject of the highest form of poetic imitation? Poetry could never present the highest virtue if the highest, like epieikeia, necessarily takes the form of a reflection on the imperfection of the "best." No action could ever reveal the virtue which always takes the form of a reflection on action. Insofar as a poet wished to "present" the best he would have to present an action which causes reflection (i.e., reversal) rather than presenting the reflection itself (recognition). And insofar as human action approaches its best, the actor would have to present to himself an action which causes reflection. The activity of the epieikês is something like literary criticism; it consists in seeing where others have gone wrong.

Still, Aristotle certainly says that the best plot, and so the best tragedy, combines reversal and recognition – it makes reflection an action. Tragedy thus distinguishes itself from other forms of poetry by making the poetic character of human action thematic. However, to present in action a successful reflection on action (epieikeia) would not arouse wonder and so lead to reflection; it would be too pat, and so essentially invisible. The goal of tragedy is the stimulation of pity and fear because reflection is stimulated only by failure – "All happy families are alike; each unhappy family is unhappy in its own way." There is no wonder without some appearance of discrepancy. Therefore, the options for combining reversal and recognition seem to be these. The poet can either show the failure of genuine epieikeia which does not seem possible since epieikeia consists in the ability to foresee the ways in which one cannot expect virtue to be manifest in the world. /How could a disposition the very nature of which is to be sound in its avoidance of excess be shown to be excessive? /Or, the poet can show the failure of spurious reflection. This is in fact what occurs when reversal becomes recognition. Recognition will always in some sense be false recognition.

It will therefore always be subject to a higher order reversal, and so it will stimulate wonder. Oedipus thinks that he knows who he is, but when he takes the pin of Jocasta's brooch, stabs himself in his eye sockets (arthra) and pleads to be set out on Mt. Cithaeron, he is simply reproducing what had been done to him as a baby when his joints (arthra) were pinned and he was abandoned on Mt. Cithaeron.¹⁴ If he really knew "who he was" Oedipus would not once again be attempting to take his fate into his own hands. Blinding himself was not an altogether humble thing to do. He still has not learned that he too is one of the tekna of Cadmus. However, had he learned who he was, we would have been unable to learn who he was. Character, perhaps the true object of imitation in tragedy, is invisible except through plot.¹⁵ For this reason, in his ranking of the various forms of recognition in Chapter 16, Aristotle finds particular fault with that sort which is willed by the poet. Where a character simply reveals who he is, the meaning of the recognition is altogether hidden from view.¹⁶ The epieikês can express his knowledge even to himself only by articulating what would happen to him were he not to know. Oedipus could only have expressed wisdom by writing his own tragedy.

To be a rational animal does not mean what it seems to mean. It does not mean that there is a battle within us sometimes won by our good part and sometimes won by our bad part. This would make us monsters. The mixture is more intimate than that. As the tragic formula indicates, we learn through suffering or undergoing (pathei mathos); there is something irrational about our rationality.

¹⁴ See Seth Benardete, Sophocles' Oedipus Tyrannus, in Ancients and Moderns (New York, 1964), pp. 1-15.

¹⁵ Notice how the long-awaited discussion of character in Chapter 15 quickly gets derailed and turns into a discussion of plot. This movement perfectly mirrors the dependence of character on plot.

¹⁶ On the importance of seeing for tragedy see Chapter 17.

Accordingly, Aristotle's examples of the best forms of recognition all involve a figuring out (sullogismos) which turns out to be a paralogism. Tragedy has as its goal making visible the most important thing about human beings, which, as essentially invisible, cannot be shown as it really is. The action which poetizes the world cannot be shown in poetry.

It is the story alone that differentiates one tragedy from another and what constitutes the story is desis (entanglement) and lusis (unraveling). Desis includes the action from the beginning or archê (which frequently includes events prior to the beginning of the play) up to the extreme point (eschaton) where the weaving together of the events of the story stops and things begin to unravel. The lusis is all the rest from the archê of the change until the end (telos) of the play. Now there is no question that in some sense Aristotle means us to take this account linearly or temporally. There is a part of any tragedy in which things are put together and a part in which they are taken apart. At the same time, the key terms of the account all allow for an alternative interpretation. Suppose archê means not temporal beginning but first principle, telos not temporal end but purpose, eschaton not temporal or spatial extreme but utmost, and, most important, lusis not denouement but resolution understood as something like ana-lysis. For this last there is evidence internal to On Poetics where Aristotle uses lusis to mean solution or resolution (1460b6, 1461b24) and luen to mean to solve or resolve (1460b22). Lusis appears, before having been defined, in Chapter 15 (1454a37) where Aristotle indicates that it ought to come out of the story itself and not be generated "from the machine." Now, if lusis meant analysis or interpretation here, Aristotle would be saying that ✓ tragedies ought to supply their own analyses.

This would explain Aristotle's emphasis in the sequel on the fact that poets are often quite good at desis (that is what it means to be a poet – to make up stories) but less frequently good at lusis. This is his version of what Socrates says of the poets (Apology 22c) – that “they say many beautiful things but know nothing of what they say.” Poets, ordinarily good at the part of poiêtikê which involves putting the parts of a poem together, are not as a rule so good at the other part – analysis of poems according to their eidê. Tragedy is a crucial exception to this rule, for in tragedy part of the story is its lusis, an analysis of its action. Tragedy is distinct in being simultaneously synthetic or genetic – desis – and analytic or eidetic – lusis. On one level, then, the movement from desis to lusis is simply linear – there is a point in the play where things begin to unwind. On another level desis and lusis are the same. Once Oedipus utters his first words, O tekna kadmou, the meaning of his incest has already been revealed. Tragedy is something like a metaphorical analysis of metaphor in which events function simultaneously as parts of a play and eidê of its analysis. Things which look at first accidental in retrospect become absolutely necessary. Lusis in its deepest sense is not a part of the plot but a second sailing – a rereading which makes visible what was implicit from the outset but could never have been seen without first having been missed.

Tragedy is especially revealing of human action because it not only tells a story that is significant or meaningful, but also makes the fact that the story can be meaningful a part of the story it tells. Pathei mathos, the lesson of tragedy, is at the same time the structure both of human action and of human thought. Human action is imitation of action because thinking is always rethinking. Aristotle can define human beings as at once rational animals, political animals, and imitative animals because in the end the three are the same. In human action as in tragedy everything depends upon the intention of the actor. But that intention cannot be shown directly – it has to be revealed through action. When a poet tries to introduce intention directly it looks arbitrary and so is indistinguishable from chance. The true deus ex machina is therefore the human soul; it disappears as soon as one makes it visible. Ironically, the significance of our actions becomes visible only by reversing what we thought the significance to be. But that, of course, requires the initial assumption that one can see significance without reversal. You have to assume that you can see someone's character in order to see his action. This is what allows you to have your impression of the action reversed as the tragic story turns on itself so that you can "see" the character in question. We must assume Oedipus innocent in order to understand his true guilt. Blundering would seem to be the fundamental character of human action and thought.

If thought, and so human action, is essentially poetic in its need to put in place and time what cannot appear in place and time, does that mean it is essentially tragic? That is, if the recognition of tragedy is always spurious recognition, doesn't that mean we are essentially incapable of getting hold of ourselves? It does and it doesn't. Tragedy depicts tragic action, but it is not itself tragic, for if we recognize ourselves in the spurious character of Oedipus' recognition we are not simply in the position of Oedipus.

That Aristotle understands this to be true of tragedy is clear from the great compliment he pays it. On Poetics is a very playful book. In the middle of his discussion of tragic mistakes, Aristotle muses about whether those who criticize Euripides "make a mistake" (1453a8-23).¹⁷ And in a remarkable tour de finesse he digresses abruptly in Chapter 12 to discuss the chorus; the digression proves to be an example of how the chorus works in tragedy. Having introduced reversal and recognition, Aristotle moves without explanation to a short chapter on the parts of tragedy. So out of place does chapter 12 seem that many editors have suggested moving it (beginning with Heinsius in the seventeenth century), and many others (e.g., Butcher and Else) do not accept it as genuine. The chapter is certainly queer; at first glance, its list of parts – prologue, episode, exode, parodos, stasimon, and commos – seems connected to nothing else in On Poetics. Upon reflection, however, one notices that each part is defined in terms of its relation to the chorus. Now the chorus has a funny function in tragedy. They are a character insofar as what they say grows out of the plot – to understand the famous stasimon in Antigone about man as the being most deimos of all (simultaneously most canny and uncanny), one must understand what they make this claim in response to. At the same time the chorus reflect on the action of the plot, and so talk directly to the audience. The role of the chorus therefore allows them to participate on the levels of both reversal and recognition. The chorus are then in a way the defining feature of tragedy – Nietzsche notwithstanding, the spectator within the drama. It is therefore especially meet that Aristotle should discuss the chorus in a “digression.” Chapter 12 of the Poetics functions just like a stasimon; because it seems only marginally connected to what surrounds it, a choral ode looks like a reflection on what comes before and after. It is both still within the dramatic time of the play and at the same time atemporal. This “chorale ode” has as its content the centrality of the chorus for tragedy and so sheds light on what is at stake in the discussion of recognition and reversal that surrounds it.

¹⁷ In fact these men who make a mistake (bamartanousin) make the mistake that occurs within tragedy. They demand that justice prevail in the world. And if Euripides appears to be the "most tragic" of the poets, perhaps it is because he does what he ought to do even when the end does not follow from his plot. That is, Euripides' action in writing as he writes, his uniform adherence to a rule, has the makings of tragedy.

↳ In this and countless other ways On Poetics is a clever imitation of tragedy. Aristotle announced in his very first sentence that poiêtikê would involve putting together genetic and eidetic accounts. It is not surprising then that his book should admit of being read on two levels. It is about tragedy, but it is also about human action. The first is its desis, the latter its lusis. Their deep unity is the unity of the human soul.

As poet, to write up stories.

On Poetics¹

1.

1447a8

Concerning poetics, both itself and its kinds,² what particular power each has, and how stories should be put together if ¹ "Poetics" translates poiêtikê; it is the art of poiein, which means first to make or do and secondarily to make poetry. Poiêsis, the product of poiein, frequently takes on the narrower meaning of poetry. Articulating the full meaning of poiêtikê is the task that Aristotle sets himself in the book that comes down to us in the English tradition as On Poetics. Because of the weight of this tradition and the obvious concern of the book with poetry and especially tragedy, we have retained this translation. However it should be kept in mind that poiein is a very common verb in Greek, and that in principle the art dealing with it could have as much to do with making or action as with poetry in the narrower sense. Where an ambiguity of meaning seems possibly intentional, the Greek verb will be placed in brackets after the translation. Virtually every occurrence in the translation of any form of the verb "to make" is a rendering of the Greek poiein, and all appearances of English words cognate with "poet" are translations of words cognate with poiein. It is perhaps significant that the only time poiêtikê is coupled with technê (art or craft) is at the end (1460b14), for it is precisely there that Aristotle distinguishes poiêtikê from any other art. At 1447a19-20 Aristotle indicates that imitation comes to be not only by art but also by habit.

² The word is eidōs. In Plato it is used for "form" or "idea." Elsewhere in Aristotle it is used for "species," especially as opposed to genos, genus. Eidōs is regularly translated as "kind." Where the context demands another translation, eidōs follows in parentheses. Its cognate and almost synonym, idea, will be translated as "form."

the *poiêsis*³ is to be beautiful,⁴ and further from how many and from what sort of proper parts⁵ it is, and likewise also concerning whatever else belongs to the same inquiry, let us speak, beginning first according to nature from the first things. Now epic poetry⁶ and the poiêsis of tragedy, and further comedy and the art of making dithyrambs,⁷ and most of the art of the flute and of the cithara are all in general imitations.⁸ But imitations differ from one another in three

10

15

³ The meaning of poiêsis ranges from "making" or "something made" to "poetry." We have transliterated it to avoid prematurely narrowing this range. See footnote 1 above.

⁴ The Greek word here is kalôs. In its adjectival form, kalon, it means both beautiful and noble. We will translate it by both; sometimes together, sometimes, where the context demands, we will choose one or the other. Wherever another word is translated by "noble," the Greek term will follow the translation in brackets; "beautiful" will always translate kalon. The opposite of kalon, aischron, means both shameful and ugly; it will be translated similarly either by the conjunction of the two terms or as context demands by one or the other. "Ugly" will always translate aischron; wherever "shameful" translates another Greek word, the original will follow in brackets. The adverb aischrôs will be translated similarly.

⁵ Morion will be translated as "proper part." Meros will be translated as "part" although when "part" occurs in the translation it need not mean that meros occurs in the Greek text. Aristotle discusses the difference between the two terms in The Parts of Animals, which might be translated more accurately as The Proper Parts of Animals.

⁶ The Greek epopoia combines epos, epic, and a word cognate with the verb poiein.

⁷ The Greek dithyrambopoiêtikê once again combines the word for dithyramb with a cognate of poiein.

⁸ "Imitation" translates mimêsis; "to imitate" translates the verb mimêisthai. The entirety of On Poetics could be understood as an ways, for they differ either by being imitations in different things, of different things, or differently and not in the same way. For just as some who make images imitate many things by colors and figures (some through art and some through habit) and others through the voice, so also in the case of the arts mentioned, all make the imitation in rhythm and speech⁹ and harmony, but these either apart or mixed together. For example, both the art of the flute and the art of the cithara (and whatever others are of this sort with respect to their power, such as the art of the pipes) use only harmony and rhythm. But the art of dancers uses rhythm by itself apart from harmony (for they too through the rhythms of the shape of their movements imitate characters, sufferings,¹⁰ and actions). On the other hand, the art using bare speeches¹¹ alone and the one using meters, whether mixing them with one another or using some one family of meters, are in fact until now nameless. For we would not be able to give any name in common to the mimes¹² of Sophron and Xenarchus and the Socratic

20

25

1447b8

10

attempt to articulate the importance of mimêsis for understanding human nature. Of the approximately 115 occurrences of the term in Aristotle, some 80 are in On Poetics. Mimêsis, mimêma, and mimêisthat occur about 300 times in Plato.

⁹ Logos will ordinarily be rendered by "speech" and legein by "to speak"; where it is necessary to translate them otherwise, the transliterated Greek text will be supplied in brackets.

¹⁰ "Suffering" translates patbos throughout; however it has a range of meaning from "experiencing" or "undergoing" to "suffering."

¹¹ Bare, or psiloi, speeches are those that are unmetrical.

¹² Mimos, while apparently restricted here to a specific type of mimêsis, or imitation, would be the most obvious name for the entire class. Sophron wrote male and female mimes.

speeches, any more than if someone should make the imitation through trimeters or elegiacs or any other meters of that sort.¹³ Human beings, however, in connecting the making with the meter, do name some elegiac poets and others epic poets, not addressing them as poets with regard to the imitation, but with regard to the meter they have in common; for even if they publish something in meter about medicine or natural science, men are accustomed to call it by its meter. But nothing is common to Homer and Empedocles except the meter. Hence it is just to call the one poet, but to call the other, rather than poet, one who gives an account of nature.¹⁴ And similarly, even if someone should make an imitation by mixing together all the meters, as Chaerephon made the Centaur a rhapsody mixed from all meters, one would also have to address him as poet. Now, concerning these things, then, let them have been distinguished in this way. For there are some which use all the things mentioned – I mean [legō], for example, rhythm, song, and meter – such as the poiēsis of dithyrambics and of *nomos*¹⁵ and both tragedy and comedy. But they differ because some use all at the same time and others use them part by part. Now, among the arts I say [legō] the differences in what they make the imitation are these.

15

20

25

2.

1448a

Since imitators imitate those acting, and since it is necessary for them to be either of stature¹⁶ or inferior¹⁷ (characters are pretty nearly always consequences of these alone, for everyone differs in point of character by vice or by virtue¹⁸), they imitate either those better than what is on our level or worse or even the sort that are on our level, just as painters do. For Polygnotos used to make images of the better, while Pauson of the worse, and Dionysius of the similar.¹⁹ And it is also clear that each of the aforesaid imitations will have these differences, and each will be different by imitating what is different in this way (for, as a matter of fact, even in dance, in flute playing, and in cithara playing it is possible for these dissimilarities to occur as well as in the case of speeches and bare meter). Homer, for example, made them better, Cleophon similar, and Hegemon the Thasian, who first made parodies, and Nicochares, who made the Delias, worse. And in the case of dithyrambs and nomes, someone might likewise imitate just as Timotheos and Philoxenus did the Cyclopes.²⁰ And by this very difference²¹ tragedy too stands apart from comedy: the one wants to imitate those worse and the other those better than those now.

¹³ Athenaeus alludes to this passage at 11.112 (505C): "Aristotle in his About the Poets writes as follows: 'Are we not to assert that the completely unmetrical mimes of Sophron are stories (logoi) and imitations, or those of Alexamenus the Teian written before the Socratic dialogues?'"

¹⁴ The Greek is phusiologos.

¹⁵ Nomos initially means "melody" and later comes to mean "song," including both words and music. It also means law or custom.

5

10

15

3.

Further, how someone might imitate each of these is a

- ¹⁶ Spoudaios has a range of meanings: good, earnest, serious, weighty, etc. It is an important term in On Poetics and will be translated throughout by "of stature."
- ¹⁷ Phaulos means low, base, paltry, trivial, etc. It will be translated throughout by "inferior."
- ¹⁸ See Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics 1145a15–33 and 1148b15–34 in Appendix 6 below.
- ¹⁹ See Aristotle's Politics 1340a14–b17 in Appendix 5 below.
- ²⁰ We have omitted gas at 1448a15.
- ²¹ We have accepted Casaubon's addition so that the text reads autèi third difference of these. For even if the imitation is in the same things and of the same things, it is possible sometimes to imitate when reporting (either becoming some other as Homer does [poieîn] as the same and not changing) or else to imitate with all those imitating²² acting [prattontas] and being in action [energountas].²³ As we said at the beginning, imitation, then, consists in these three differences: in which, what, and how. So in one sense as imitator Sophocles would be the same as Homer, for both imitate those of stature, while, in another, he would be the same as Aristophanes, for both imitate those acting [prattontas] and doing [drôntas]. From whence some say they are also called *dramata*²⁴ because they imitate those doing [drôntas]. It is for this reason that the Dorians also make a claim²⁵ to tragedy and comedy (For the local Megarians make a claim to comedy as having emerged at the time of their democra-

25

30

de tautêi têi diaphorai.

- ²² Some editors believe that the phrase "those imitating" is either corrupt or interpolated. Aristotle seems to be bringing out the curious fact that, if one disregards exits and entrances, despite being an "imitation of action," tragedy contains no action in the literal sense. The definition thus refers to the plot as an action.
- ²³ Aristotle uses the verb energein here; its cognate noun, energeia, is an important term in Aristotle, literally indicating something that has its ergon (work, deed, function) within itself, that is, something complete and at the same time at work or in motion. See, for example, Metaphysics 9.1-6.
- ²⁴ Dramata are in the broad sense "doings" and in the narrower sense "dramas."
- ²⁵ The word is antipoiontai, again a compound of the verb poiein. It can also mean "to exert oneself over" or "to have something done in return to one"; etymologically it might be construed as "antipoetize."

cy.²⁶ And those in Sicily make a claim to it, for Epicharmus, the poet, was from there; he was much earlier than Chionides and Magnes.²⁷ And some of those in the Peloponnese make a claim to tragedy.) The Dorians make names the sign. For they say that they call their outlying districts villages [kômai], while the Athenians call them

35

26 Aristotle discusses Megarian comedy at Nicomachean Ethics 1123a20–24: “The vulgar man spends a lot in small expenditures and strikes a false note in making a brilliant display, in feasting, for example, his picnic-guests on the lavish scale of a wedding, and in underwriting a comic chorus introduces purple in the parodos, as those in Megara do.” The scholium on this passage runs: “It was usual to make leather skins as the screens in comedy and not purple. . . . The Megarians are ridiculed in comedy, since they also claim that comedy was first discovered by them, inasmuch as the one who started comedy was Susarion the Megarian. They are disparaged as vulgar and tasteless and for using purple in the parodos. Aristophanes, at any rate, in mocking them, says somewhere, ‘No stolen joke from Megara.’ Ecphantides the oldest poet of old comedy says, ‘I shall not go through a song of Megarian comedy; I am ashamed to make a Megarian drama.’ It is shown on all sides that the Megarians are the inventors of comedy.”

27 Epicharmus is mentioned in Plato’s Theaetetus (152e1–5); Socrates is speaking about the Heraclitean thesis: “Nothing ever is, but everything is always becoming. All of the wise, with the exception of Parmenides, concur about this, Protagoras, Heraclitus, and Empedocles, and of the poets, those who are tip-top in each kind of poetry, Epicharmus of comedy, and Homer, of tragedy.” He is also mentioned in Iamblichus’s Life of Pythagoras (36.266): “Epicharmus too was one of the external auditors [of the Pythagoreans], but he did not belong to the inner circle. On his arrival in Syracuse, he abstained from philosophizing openly on account of the tyranny of Hiero, but he put into meter the thoughts of the Pythagoreans, making known their secret doctrines playfully.”

demes, as if comedians or revel singers [kômôdoi] were so called not from reveling [kômazein] but by wandering from village to village [kata kômas], and driven in dishonor from the town. And they say they name doing [poiein] dran, but that the Athenians name it prattein.²⁸ About the differences of imitation, then, both how many they are and of what they are, let these things have been said.

1448b

4.

Some two causes, and these natural, are likely to have generated poetics as a whole. For just as to imitate is natural to human beings from childhood (and in this they differ from the rest of the animals in that they are the most imitative and do [poieitai] their first learning through imitation), so also is it natural for everyone to take pleasure in imitations. And what happens in the way we act is a sign of this; for we take pleasure in contemplating the most precisely made images of things which in themselves we see with pain, for example, the visible shapes both of the least estimable of beasts and of corpses.²⁹ And the cause of this

5

10

²⁸ The verb dran is common in Aristotle and in Attic authors generally. This passage is the only evidence we have that it is of Doric origin.

²⁹ See On the Parts of Animals 644b22–645a30 in Appendix 2 below. Consider with this Aristotle's On the Motion of Animals (701b18–22): "Imagination [phantasia] and thinking [noesis] have the power of [experienced] things [pragmata], for in a certain way the kinds of the hot, cold, pleasant, or fearful, when they are thought, are in fact of the same sort as is each of the things. Accordingly, men both shudder and fear by thought alone." See as well On the Soul (427b21–24): "Further, whenever we have the opinion of something terrible or fearful, we immediately experience it, and likewise if the opinion is of something encouraging. And we are likewise in the same condition in terms of our imag-is that not only is learning most pleasant for philosophers, but also for everyone else alike, although they share in it to a small extent. They are pleased in seeing images because in their contemplating there is a coincidence of learning and figuring out³⁰ what each thing is, for example "That's him!"³¹ since if by chance one has not seen it before, it will not qua imitation [mimêma] produce [poiêsei] pleasure except on account of its workmanship or color or on account of some other cause of this sort.³² Since to imitate is natural for us, as well as harmony and rhythm (for it is manifest that meters are proper parts of rhythms), from the beginning those most naturally inclined toward them, ination, just as would be the case were we to contemplate in a painting the terrible or encouraging things."

15

20

³⁰ The verb is sullogizesthai, literally "to think together"; it is cognate with our "syllogism."

³¹ Literally "that this [man is] that." This is a common idiom used to indicate a sudden recognition that what one thought something was is really something else. The first known occurrence of this expression is Herodotus 1.32 at the climax of the story of the meeting of Solon and Croesus, their conversation about who is the happiest of men; this is, in a way, the logos behind tragedy. Consider also Sophocles' Oedipus Tyrannus 1145, where a similar phrase precipitates the recognition and reversal of the play and his Philoctetes 261 where Philoctetes says, "I am that one (bode eimi ekeinos) whom perhaps you've heard of as master of the bow of Heracles." Immediately after he realizes that Neoptolemus has not recognized him through his own notorious, as he believes, sufferings. See also Sophocles' Oedipus at Colonus, 138; Ichneutai (fragment 102 in Diggle, Tragicorum graecorum fragmenta); Aristophanes' Clouds, 985, 1152, 1167; Plato's Charmides, 166b; Hippias Major, 296d; Phaedrus, 241d; Symposium, 210e, 233a. See also Aristotle's Rhetoric 1410b10–27 in Appendix 3 below.

³² See Aristotle's Politics 1340a14–b15 in Appendix 5 below.

advancing little by little, generated poiësis from their improvisations.³³ Poiësis broke apart along the lines of their own characters. For the more august were imitators of beautiful and noble actions and men of the sort that do them, while the meaner imitated the actions of the inferior, first making invectives just as the others made hymns and encomia.³⁴ Now, although we cannot say that anyone made a poem of this sort before Homer, it is likely that there were many. But if we begin from Homer, it is possible (for example, his Margites and poems of this sort). The iambic meter too came about in invectives as is fitting for them, on account of which even now it is called iambic because they

25

30

³³ See Pseudo-Aristotle, Problemata 920b29–921a6: “Why is it that everyone enjoys rhythm, song, and in general consonances? Is it because we naturally enjoy motions that are natural? The sign is that children as soon as they are born enjoy them. It is due to their character that we enjoy different manners of songs. And we enjoy rhythm because it has a recognizable and ordered number, and it moves us in an ordered way; for ordered motion is more akin to us by nature than disordered. Here is a sign: when we are toiling, drinking, or eating in an orderly way, we preserve and increase our nature and power, but if they are done in a disordered way, we destroy and alter it. The illnesses of the body are disturbances of the order of the body that is not according to nature. And we enjoy consonance because it is a blending of contraries that maintain a certain ratio [logos] in relation to one another. Now logos is an order, which, it was agreed, was pleasant by nature. And the blended is naturally more pleasant than the unblended, especially if on being perceptible the logos in the consonance should maintain the power of both extremes equally.”

³⁴ In Book 2 of Plato’s Republic (372b7), citizens of the first of Socrates’ cities make encomia to the gods; in Book 10 (607a4), men are included, for “hymns to the gods and encomia to the good” are to be allowed in the city.

used to lampoon [iambizon] one another in this meter. And some of the ancients became poets of heroic meter and some of iambs. Just as Homer was also especially the poet of things of stature (for not only did he make other things well but also dramatic imitations³⁵), so also was he the first to indicate the characteristic shape of comedy, making not invective but a drama³⁶ of the laughable. For Margites stands in an analogy: just as the Iliad and the Odyssey are related to tragedies so is this related to comedies. Once tragedy and comedy came to light side by side, each initiating a turn toward each sort of poiêsis in conformity with their own nature, some became makers of comedy instead of iambs, and others became producers³⁷ of tragedy instead of epics, because the latter forms [schêmata] were greater and more estimable than the former.³⁸ Now, to go further

35

1449a

5

35 The phrase mimêseis dramatikas might also be translated "imitations of action."

36 Or "action."

37 Didaskalos, here producer, also has the non-technical and much more common sense of "teacher."

38 For an alternative sequence in the origin of drama consider Livy Book 7.2-3.1: "In this year [365 BC] and the following, when C. Sulpicius Peticus and Caius Licinius Stolo were consuls, there was a plague. Nothing worth recording was done except that for the sake of imploring the gods' peace, a lectisternium [a banquet offered to the gods] was held for the third time since the founding of the city; and when the violence of the disease was not alleviated by either human counsels or divine help, with minds overcome by superstition, theatrical performances are said to have been instituted among other ways of placating celestial wrath. This was a novelty for a warlike people, though there had been circus spectacles. The theatrical performance was a small thing, as are almost all beginnings, and it was besides a foreign affair. Without any song, without the performance of songs to be imiin examining whether tragedy is or is not by now sufficient in respect to its kinds, in order to judge it both by itself in

tated, players, summoned from Etruria, danced to the tunes of a piper, and gestured decently in the Etruscan manner. Afterwards the young began to imitate them, spouting funny things among themselves in crude verses, and their gestures matched their speech. Once it had been adopted it advanced by frequent use. The native born players, because a player in Etruscan is called ister, got the name bistriones. These actors no longer bandied about among themselves a verse like to the Fescinine that was extemporaneous and unpolished, but they performed melodic saturae [medleys], with a song now written out for the piper and with the appropriate gestures. After a few years Livius Andronicus was the first to discard saturae and weave a story into a plot. At first, he, just as everyone else, was the actor of his own songs; but it is said, when he was often called back for an encore he ruined his voice, and when permission was granted he placed a boy in front of the piper in order to sing, while he acted out the song with somewhat more effective gestures, since he no longer had to use his voice. Afterwards, actors had songs sung in accordance with their gestures, and the only thing left for them to do was to speak dialogue. When with this regulation of stories they had turned aside from laughter and unrestrained joking, and play was altered little by little into an art, the youth, once the performance of dramas had been left for the actors, began on their own in the old-fashioned way to toss about among themselves funny things woven into verses. These farces were later called exodia [after-songs] and were mostly joined with Atellanae dramas. They were a kind of play taken from the Oscans [Atella being a town in Campania where the Oscans lived], and the youth did not allow it to be polluted by actors. It was thus established that the performers of Atellanae were not to have their names removed from the register of the tribe to which they belonged, and they should serve in the army just as if they had nothing in common with the theatrical art.

“Among the small beginnings of other things it was thought fitting to set down the first origin of the theater, so that it might relation to itself and in relation to the spectators, is another account [logos]. But regardless of that issue, it came to be from an improvisatory beginning (both it and comedy, one from those who took the lead in the dithyramb and the other from those in the phallic songs, which even now in many cities continue by customary practice) and increased little by little as they made advances in as much of it as was evident to them.³⁹ After undergoing many changes, tragedy stopped when it attained its own nature. Aeschylus was the appear how from a sound beginning it has come into this kind of madness that is hardly tolerable for wealthy kingdoms. Still all in all the first beginning of plays, granted for the administration of religious rites, did not relieve minds from religion or bodies from sickness."

10

15

³⁹ Lucas cites a passage from Archilochus as evidence that this leader, the exarchôn, not only led the chorus, but in improvising new words in response to their traditional refrain, was an anticipation of the distinction between actors and chorus (Aristotle: Poetics 80). In the absence of any ancient dithyrambs, Pindar's Pythian 11 offers a way to understand how choral lyric could have evolved into tragedy. There Pindar first recounts Clytaemestra's murder of Cassandra and Agamemnon, and the rescue of Orestes by his nurse (17-22), and at the end Orestes' murder of his mother and Aegisthus (36-37). In between he asks himself the question whether Clytaemestra killed Agamemnon because of the sacrifice of Iphigeneia or her adultery with Aegisthus, and accordingly whether Orestes had proper grounds for killing his mother (22-25). Pindar does not answer this question; instead, immediately after he records Orestes' murder of his mother, he turns to the chorus and asks whether he became dizzy at the crossroads and abandoned the right path he was on before. Pindar, in other words, duplicates the madness of Orestes on the level of reflection rather than of action. It seems, then, not to be an enormous step to translate Pindar's puzzle into a mimetic action.

first to bring the number of performers from one to two, to diminish the role of the chorus, and provide for speech to take the leading part. Sophocles then provided three actors and scene painting. And further, because it was transformed out of the satyr drama from stories small in magnitude and of a laughable way of talking,⁴⁰ it just lately got its august finish, while the meter, from having been tetrameter became iambic. At first they used tetrameter because the poiêsis was satyric and more suited for dancing, but once there was talking, nature herself discovered the proper meter, for iambic is the meter most characteristic of talk. And a sign of this is that we speak mostly iambs in talking with one another, while we speak hexameters seldom and when we depart from the intonation⁴¹ of talk. And further, the number of episodes increased. But as for the other things, how each are said to have been arranged, let them have been mentioned by us, for it would perhaps be quite a task to go through them one by one.

5.

Comedy, just as we said, is an imitation of what is inferior to a greater degree, not however with respect to all vice, but the laughable is a proper part of the shameful and ugly. For the laughable is a sort of mistake and ugliness that is painless and not destructive, such as for instance the laughable mask is something ugly and distorted, but without causing pain. The changes of tragedy and that through which they came to be have not passed unnoticed, but comedy because it was of no stature from the beginning passed

⁴⁰ Lexis is spoken speech and, except where particularly awkward, will be rendered by "talk." Here it is "way of talking."

⁴¹ The Greek is harmonia, which has a range of meaning from "agreement" or "joining" to "scale."

unnoticed.⁴² For the archon just lately gave a chorus of ⁴² There is only fragmentary ancient evidence about the origin and development of comedy. The following is in a fragment of a literary history (from Kaibel's edition of Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta [Berlin 1958], pp. 6-7: "They say that comedy was discovered by Sousarion, and some say it got its name from the fact that they used to go around singing and putting on a show village by village, when there were not yet cities but men lived in villages, but others contradict them and say they are not called kômai among the Athenians but demes, and they call it comedy because they used to revel in the roadways. They assert as well that comedy is also called trugôdia because new wine, which was called trux (lees), was offered at the Lenaion to those in high repute, or else it was because when masks had not yet been invented they used to smear their faces with lees when they acted." And the following from a Scholium to Dionysius Thrax, p. 14 (Kaibel): "The aim of tragedy is to move its auditors to lamentation, the aim of comedy to move it to laughter. They say accordingly that tragedy dissolves life, comedy puts it together." {This remark is found in several other notices about comedy.} And from Athenaeus (14.621D) on Doric comedy (Kaibel, 73-74): "Among the Spartans there was a certain ancient form of comic playfulness, as Sosibius says, not of very much stature, because Sparta even then was aiming at the plain and simple. One used to imitate with a cheap style of talk people stealing the harvest or a foreign doctor saying the sort of things one finds in Alexis's Mandragorizomene, . . . and those who practiced this kind of play were called among the Spartans deikelistai (exhibitors), or as one would say makers of theatrical props and mimes. There are many different names in different regions for deikelistai. The Sicyonians call them phallophoroi (phallus-carriers), others call them autokabdaloï (improvisers), others phluakes (jesters), as Italians do, and the many call them sophists. Semus the Delian in the book 'About Paean,' says the so-called autokabdaloï were crowned with ivy and recited speeches slowly; but later they were called iamboi, both them and their poems; but the itruphalloi (those with erect phalluses) wore masks of drunkards and

comic singers, but before that they were volunteers.⁴³ But only when it already had certain characteristics are those who are said to be poets of comedy remembered. And who assigned to it masks, or prologues, or a number of performers, and other things of this sort has remained unknown.⁴⁴ The making of stories came on the one hand from the beginning from Sicily, but of those in Athens, Crates was the first to make speeches and stories of a general character once he discarded the form of the lampoon.

Epic poetry follows tragedy as far as being an imitation of men of stature⁴⁵ in speech with meter, but in this it crowns, with brightly colored sleeves [gloves?]; they wore half-white chitons, with a ribbon of diaphanous material that covered them up to their ankles. They entered in silence through the gateway, and on turning to the audience said, 'Get up! Make room for the god! He wants to go through the middle upright and throbbing.' The phallophoroi, he says, do not wear a mask, but they put on a visor of tufted thyme and chervil and a crown thick with violets and ivy. They wear thick cloaks and enter, some through the parodos and others through the middle door, and going in rhythm they say, 'We celebrate this muse for you, Bacchus, pouring out a simple rhythm for a complex song; it is novel and virginal, without the use of any previous songs, but we take the lead in an uncontaminated hymn.' Then in running forward they mock whomever they choose."

⁴³ Aristotle Constitution of Athens 56.2-3: "The archon, as soon as he enters office makes a proclamation to the effect that everyone keeps and controls as much as he had before he entered office until the end of his rule. Next he appoints three chorégoi (chorus-providers) for the tragic singers from the wealthiest Athenians. Previously he used to provide five for the comic singers, but now the tribes support them."

⁴⁴ This is the passive of the verb agnoiein – elsewhere translated as "to be ignorant."

⁴⁵ The Greek could also mean "things of stature."

differs: in having a simple meter and being a report. And further, they differ in length. The one tries especially to be bound by one circuit of the sun or to vary only a little from this, but epic poetry is indeterminate with respect to time, and in this it differs, although at first they used to do this alike in tragedies and in epics. Some parts are the same, but some are peculiar to tragedy. For this reason, whoever knows about tragedy of stature and inferior tragedy knows also about epics. For what epic poetry has belongs to tragedy, but all that belongs to it is not in epic poetry.

15

20

6.

About the art of imitation in hexameters, then, and about comedy, we will speak later; but let us speak about tragedy, taking up the definition of its being that comes to be on the basis of what has been said of it.⁴⁶ Tragedy, then, is an imitation of an action that is of stature and complete, with magnitude, that, by means of sweetened speech,⁴⁷ but with each of its kinds separate in its proper parts, is of people acting⁴⁸ and not through report, and accomplishes

25

⁴⁶ "Being" translates ousia; elsewhere it is the first of the categories of being (on), that in relation to which the nine others are to be understood. (Aristotle also regularly uses it to mean "property" – the two meanings being related as are our "realty" and "reality"). Rarely does ousia occur in Aristotle of an artifact except by way of an example. Here it is particularly striking because it is juxtaposed with becoming. Aristotle nowhere else uses the phrase "the definition that comes to be" (ho ginomenos boros).

⁴⁷ We have followed the suggestion by Professor Gregory Sifakis in a lecture at New York University that hêdusmenôî logôî is an instrumental dative.

⁴⁸ The word is drôntôn, the present genitive plural participle of the verb dran.

through pity and fear the cleansing⁴⁹ of experiences of this sort.⁵⁰ I mean [legô] by "sweetened speech" that which has rhythm, harmony, and song, and by "separate in its kinds" sometimes through meters alone accomplishing its task and again at other times through song. And (1) since they do [poiountai] the imitation by acting [prattontes], the ordered arrangement of the *opsis*⁵¹ would in the first place be of necessity some proper part of tragedy. Next, (2) song-making and (3) talk would be as well, for they do [poiountai] the imitation in these. By the putting together of the meters, I mean [legô] talk in the strict sense, and by song-making I mean what has an altogether evident power. But, since imitation is of action, and it is acted by some who are acting who necessarily are of a certain sort with respect to (4) character and (5) thought⁵² (for it is through these that we say actions also are of a certain sort, and it is

30

35

1450a

⁴⁹ "Cleansing" is katharsis; Aristotle treats it at somewhat more length at Politics 1342a5-16. See Appendix 1f. Many believe that its definition dropped out after "through song" below.

⁵⁰ "Experiences" translates pathêmata, which has the same root as pathos, translated as "suffering." Pathêmata also occurs at 1459b11, where, however, it has the same meaning as pathos.

⁵¹ The Greek is ho tês opseôs kosmos. Kosmos means "order" or "the order" - i.e., the cosmos. It may also mean "adornment." Opsis (plural opseis) means primarily "spectacle" here, but may also refer to the faculty of sight or even to the visage (we have transliterated it throughout to preserve this range of meaning). Ho tês opseôs kosmos clearly refers, in the first instance, to the way in which the visible features of drama are arranged on the stage and includes such things as scenery and costumes but also the entrances and exits of the actors.

⁵² "Character" is êthos, and "thought" is dianoia; these terms are introduced by Aristotle at the beginning of Nicomachean Ethics Book 2 to designate respectively moral and intellectual virtue.

according to these that all are either fortunate or unfortunate), and (6) since the story is the imitation of the action, and thought and character are by nature the two causes of actions⁵³ (for I mean [legô] this by story,⁵⁴ the putting

5

⁵³ Following a tentative suggestion of Vahlen we have moved this clause – “and thought and character are by nature the two causes of actions” – here from 1450a1; this requires emending pephuken to read pephuked. This change solves the puzzle of the strangely repetitive character of the text from 1449b6 to 1450a3 and also avoids a men solitarium at 1450d3. In addition it has interesting consequences for the way the argument builds toward the primacy of story among the proper parts of tragedy.

⁵⁴ The word is muthos; Aristotle uses it in a distinctive way here, for it means not only story or tale but also its composition. Muthos originally means “word,” “speech,” or “something said.” Later it comes to mean “story” or “tale” and is opposed to logos – “rational account.” It is significant that it is used to describe stories that deal with the gods. In On Poetics, Aristotle gives it the more technical meaning of “plot,” while at the same time he diminishes the role of the divine in tragedy almost to the point of its disappearance. We have translated muthos as “story” throughout as a reminder of how radical an innovation Aristotle’s understanding of plot is. Muthos as “plot” occurs nowhere prior to Aristotle. Elsewhere in Aristotle muthos has one of two meanings: either something remarkable or of a divine cause. On the relation of muthos to logos with respect to the divine and to tragedy consider the following excerpt from Plato’s Cratylus (408b8–d2):

Socrates: And the likely, my comrade, holds Pan to be the double-natured son of Hermes.

Hermogenes: How is that?

Socrates: You know that logos signifies everything and is always circling and revolving around everything, and is double, true and false.

Hermogenes: Yes, of course.

Socrates: Isn’t the case that the true part of it is smooth, divine, and dwells above among the gods, but the false dwells below among the many of human beings and is rough and tragic; for most muthoi and falsehoods are there, about the tragic life.

together of events,⁵⁵ and I mean by characters that according to which we say those acting are of a certain sort, and I mean by thought that by which, while speaking, they demonstrate something or declare their judgment), it is necessary for there to be six parts of all tragedy according to which tragedy is of a certain sort. And these are story, characters, talk, thought, opsis, and song-making. Two parts are those in which they imitate, one is how they imitate, and three are what they imitate, and besides these there are none. Not a few of these parts have been used as virtually kinds of tragedy.⁵⁶ For even opsis has all [of tragedy], and in the same way it has character, story, talk, song, and thought.⁵⁷ But the greatest of these is the putting together of events. For tragedy is an imitation, not of human beings, but of actions and of life. Both happiness and wretchedness⁵⁸

10

15

Hermogenes: Yes, of course.

Socrates: Then rightly would he who reveals everything (pan) and is always (aei) revolving (polôn) be Pan goatherd (aipolos), the double-natured son of Hermes, whose upper part is smooth, the lower rough and goatlike (tragoidês).

⁵⁵ "Event" is pragma. Pragmata is "the business at hand," but the word, like praxis, derives from the verb "to act" – prattein. Pragmata therefore in some sense stand to praxis as do things done to the doing of them.

⁵⁶ The sentence is clearly corrupt and as it stands is untranslatable; however the megiston de at 1450a15 suggests the sense, viz., that every part of tragedy may determine the character of a kind of tragedy but that the greatest of these is story.

⁵⁷ Two of the five parts of tragedy listed here (character and song) have nominative forms identical to their accusative forms. Were the other three in the list also nominative the sentence would read as follows: For even opsis has everything, and character, story, song, talk, and thought have everything likewise.

⁵⁸ "Wretchedness" [kakodaimonia] is the substantive equivalent of depend on action, and the end is an action, not a quality.⁵⁹ But human beings are of a certain sort according to their characters but happy or the opposite according to their actions. Therefore, they do not act in order to imitate characters, but they include characters because of actions; so that the events and the story are the end of tragedy, and the end is the greatest of all. Further, without action, tragedy could not come to be, but without characters it could come to be. For the tragedies of most of the recent poets are characterless, and in general many poets are of the same sort as, in the case of the painters, Zeuxis stands toward Polygnotus. For Polygnotus is a good painter of character while the painting of Zeuxis has no character at all.⁶⁰ Further, if one places in a sequence declamations involving character and well-made with respect to talk and thought, he will not make what was taken to be the function of tragedy, but the tragedy which has employed these elements to a lesser degree will do it much more if it has story, i.e., the putting together of events. In addition to these kakodaimôn, which always carries with it the notion of contempt; it is extremely common in Aristophanes (89 times), four times in Plato (Apollodorus' use of it at Symposium 173d1 gives a good indication of its meaning), once in Euripides (Hippolytus 1362), and nowhere else in Aristotle.

20

25

30

⁵⁹ "Quality" (poiotês) is virtually restricted in Aristotle to the Categories, Analytcs, Physics, and Metaphysics. Apart from this single occurrence in On Poetics it occurs four times in the Eudemian Ethics in a discussion of character (1220b) but in neither the Politics nor Nicomachean Ethics. It is a word coined by Socrates in Plato's Theaetetus, for which he apologizes, for in the context it looks as if there is a pun on making (poiein).

⁶⁰ Pliny (Natural History 35.62) says that Zeuxis painted a Penelope whose character he seems to have depicted. He also says that Polygnotus first opened the mouth and showed the teeth (35.58).

parts the greatest things by which tragedy guides the soul⁶¹ are parts of the story, reversals and recognitions.⁶² Further, a sign of this is that those attempting to make poetry [poiein], like almost all of the first poets, are able to be precise with respect to talk and characters earlier than they are able to put events together. Story, then, is the first principle⁶³ and like the soul of tragedy, and characters are second.

35

⁶¹ "Guides the soul" is psuchagôgei; it referred originally to the leading of souls into or out of Hades and therefore to a kind of sorcery and black magic. The adjective psuchagôgikon occurs at 1450b16 of opsis. Neither word occurs anywhere else in Aristotle. Psuchagôgia (leading of the soul) occurs twice in Plato's Phaedrus of the power of speech (261a8, 271c10). In Plato's Minos (321a4-5), Socrates says that tragedy is the most demos-pleasing and psychagogic of poetry. In the Timaeus (71a6), apparitions (phantasmata) occur by day and by night through the liver, which the god inserted in order to lead the soul. In the Laws (909b2-3), the Athenian Stranger speaks of atheistic sorcerers who in contempt of mankind enchant (psuchagôgousin) many of the living and claim to lead the souls of the dead. The scholium on Euripides' Alcestis 1128 says that there are Thessalian sorcerers called psuchagôgoi who by means of magical purifications lead back and forth phantom images, and the Spartans once sent for them when the phantom image of Pausanias terrified those who approached the temple of Artemis where they had slain him. In Xenophon Memorabilia (3.10.6), Socrates says that what more than anything else enchants (psuchagôgei) men through opsis is to make a statue appear alive. Strabo (1.2.3) says that Greek cities educate through music not for the sake of psuchagôgia but for the sake of inducing sobriety.

⁶² "Recognition" (anagnôrisis) occurs once at Eudemian Ethics 1237a25 and nowhere else in Aristotle. It occurs once in Plato. It does not occur in any other classical author. "Reversal" (peripeteia) occurs twice elsewhere in Aristotle.

⁶³ Archê, elsewhere translated as "beginning" is translated here as "first principle."

(It is pretty nearly the same in the art of painting; if one should smear on the most beautiful colors at random one would not give delight to a like degree as one would were one to give an image in outline.) In short, tragedy is an imitation of action and it is especially because of this that it is of those acting. Thought is third, and this is to be able to say what is the case and what is fitting, which is the same as the task of the arts of politics and rhetoric in treating the way we speak, for the ancients made them speak politically and those now rhetorically.⁶⁴ Character shows up in the choice that one makes.⁶⁵ Accordingly, there are speeches that have no character, in which there is not in general anything that the speaker chooses or avoids. But thought is in those speeches in which those with character show that something is or is not, or declare something in general. Talk is fourth, and I mean [legō] by talk, just as was said before, the communication through language that has the same power both in meters and in speeches. Of the rest, song-making is the greatest of the things that sweeten,⁶⁶ but

1450b

5

10

15

⁶⁴ The tenth chapter of the tenth book of the Nicomachean Ethics (1179a33–1181b24) goes some way in explaining the meaning of this difference: to speak politically means to know the difference between shame and fear, and between those who respond to the noble and those whom the threat of punishment alone motivates, and to speak rhetorically means to deny this difference in natures, for speech is all-powerful, and to believe that legislation consists solely in the collection of highly regarded laws. Homer attributes the knowledge of the political way of speaking to Odysseus (Iliad 2.188–205).

⁶⁵ We have followed the Arabic translation in omitting the phrase en bois ouk esti dêlon proaireitai ê pheugei at 1450b9–10.

⁶⁶ Consider Plutarch's Amatorius (769C): "Just as poetry fits songs, meters, and rhythms as sweeteners to speech (logos), and makes the educative part of it more stimulating and the harmful part of

opsis, while it has the capacity to guide the soul, is the most artless part and least proper to poetics. For the power of tragedy is possible without a contest and performers, and further, concerning the production of opseis the art of the costume-maker is more sovereign than that of the poets.

20

7.

Now that these things have been determined, let us say after this of what sort the putting together of the events ought to be since this is the first and greatest part of tragedy. We have posited tragedy to be an imitation of a complete and whole action having some magnitude; for there is also a whole which has no magnitude. What has a beginning, middle, and end is a whole. A beginning is whatever in itself is not of necessity after something else but after which another [heteron] has a nature to be or to become. But an end, on the contrary, is whatever in itself has a nature to be after something else – either of necessity or for the most part⁶⁷ – but after it nothing else. And a middle is that which is both in itself after something else and after which there is another. Well-put-together stories, then, ought neither to begin from just anywhere nor end just anywhere but use the aforesaid forms. And further, since the beautiful, both animal and every matter [pragma] which is put together from certain things, ought not only to have these things in an ordered arrangement but also ought

25

30

35

it less capable of being guarded against, so nature crowns woman with the grace of looks, the persuasiveness of voice, and the attractiveness of form, and while it enhances the allure of the unchaste, it equally assists the chaste in inducing the loving kindness of a husband.”

⁶⁷ Hōs epi to polu – “for the most part” – is extremely frequent in Aristotle and often designates the natural.

to have from the beginning a magnitude that is not just arbitrary — for the beautiful consists in magnitude and order, whence neither could a very small animal be something beautiful (for its contemplation is blurred by coming to be in an almost imperceptible time) nor could a very great animal (for its contemplation occurs not at the same time, and the oneness and wholeness vanish from its contemplation for those contemplating it) such as if there should be an animal of ten thousand stades,⁶⁸ so that, just as in the case of bodies and of animals they must have a magnitude, and this must be easily seen in a single glance, so also in the case of stories they must have a length, and this must be easily remembered. But limit of length that is relative to contests and the perception of them does not belong to the art. For if a hundred tragedies had to be in a contest they would be contesting against the water clock, as now and then they say to be the case. But the limit according to the nature of the matter [pragma] itself is this: the greater is always the more beautiful with respect to magnitude up to the point that it remains manifest all together. So, if one were to speak so as to delimit it in an unqualified way, an adequate limit of magnitude consists in whatever magnitude a change occurs either to good fortune from ill fortune or to ill fortune from good fortune of things that come to be in succession according to the likely or the necessary.

1451a

5

10

15

8.

A story is one not as some suppose it is if it is concerned with one human being, for countless many things happen to one human being out of which, with the exception of some, nothing is a one. So also the actions of one human being are many out of which no one action comes to be. Therefore, all of the poets are likely to have been mistaken who have made a Heracleid, a Theseid, and poems of this sort. For they suppose that since Heracles was one, it is fitting for the story too to be one. But just as Homer is distinguished in everything else, so too is it likely that he beautifully saw this, either because of his art or his nature. For, in making the Odyssey, he did not make everything that happened to Odysseus, such as his being wounded at Parnassus and making out as if he were crazy at the call to arms, of which it was neither necessary nor likely that because the one came to be the other came to be. But he put together the Odyssey concerning a single action in just the way we say, and the Iliad similarly. Just as in the other imitative arts the single imitation is of a single thing, so also the story, since it is an imitation of action, ought to be of one action, and this a whole. And the parts of the events ought to have been put together so that when a part is transposed or removed, the whole becomes different and changes. For whatever makes no noticeable difference if it is added or not added is no proper part of the whole.

⁶⁸ A stade is approximately 606 feet.

9.

It is also apparent from what has been said that this too is not the task of the poet, i.e., to speak of what has come to be, but rather to speak of what sort of things would come to be, i.e., of what is possible according to the likely or the necessary.⁶⁹ For the historian and the poet do not differ by speaking either in meters or without meters (since it would be possible for the writings of Herodotus be put in meters, and they would no less be a history with meter than without meters). But they differ in this: the one speaks of what has come to be while the other speaks of what sort would come to be. Therefore poiêsis is more philosophic and of more stature than history. For poetry speaks rather of the general things while history speaks of the particular things.

⁶⁹ This coupling of the likely and the necessary in a phrase is limited in Aristotle to On Poetics.

 The general, that it falls to a certain sort of man to say or do certain sorts of thing according to the likely or the necessary, is what poetry aims at in attaching names.⁷⁰ But the particular is what Alcibiades did [epraxen] or what he suffered. Now, in the case of comedy this has already become clear; for, having put together the story through likelihoods, only then do they support it with random names, but they do not make poetry [poiouein] about the individual as the makers of lampoons do. But with tragedy they cling to actual names. The cause of this is that the possible is persuasive. Just as, then, we do not trust to be possible things that have not yet come to be, so it is evident that the things that came to be are possible, for otherwise they would not have come to be if they were impossible. Nevertheless even in tragedies, in some, one or two of the names are of those known while the rest have been made up, and in some none are known, as, for example, in the Antheus of Agathon. For both the events and the names alike have been made up in it, and it delights no less. So that one ought not seek to cling completely to the stories that have been handed down concerning those whom tragedies are about. For to seek this would also be laughable, since even things known are known to few, but nevertheless they delight all. It is clear then from these things, that the poet [poiêtês] must be a ⁷⁰ Compare Plato's Phaedrus 271c10-272b2.

maker [poiêtês] of stories rather than of meters, insofar as he is a poet by virtue of imitation, and he imitates actions. And he is no less a poet should he happen to make what came to be, for nothing prevents some of the things that came to be from being the sort of things it is likely would come to be, and it is in light of this that he is a poet.

Of simple stories and actions the episodic are worst. I mean [legô] by an episodic story one in which the episodes following one another are neither likely nor necessary.⁷¹ Tragedies of this sort are made by inferior poets on account of themselves and by the good poets on account of the performers, for it is because they engage in [poiountes] competitions and stretch the story beyond its capacity that they are often compelled to twist the sequence out of shape. But the imitation is not only of a complete action but of fearful and pitiable things, and these come to be both especially or more whenever on account of one another they come to be contrary to expectation.⁷² For if this is the case, it will be more wondrous than if they come to be spontaneously or by chance, since even among chance things those seem most wondrous which appear to have come to be as if for a purpose. For example, the statue of Mityz at Argos killed the one who was the cause of the death of Mityz; it fell on him while he contemplated it.⁷³ For it is likely that as things of this sort do not come to be at random, so stories of this sort are of necessity more beautiful.

⁷¹ Consider Aristotle's Metaphysics 1090b19-20: "On the basis of the phenomena, nature seems not to be episodic, as if it were like a poor tragedy."

⁷² Para tèn doxan could also mean "contrary to opinion."

⁷³ Plutarch adds that Mityz was killed during a civil war, i.e., his killer was not necessarily aiming at him.

10.

Of stories, some are simple while others are of a complex weave, for the actions, also, of which the stories are imitations, are from the start just of these sorts. And I mean [legô] by simple an action that comes to be as continuous and one, as we defined them, and of which the change comes to be without reversal or recognition, and by a tragedy of a complex weave, an action in⁷⁴ which the change is with a recognition or a reversal or both. And these ought to come to be from the very putting together of the story so that it happens that, on the basis of what occurred previously, these things come to be either from necessity or according to the likely. It makes a great deal of difference whether what we have before us comes to be because of what we have before us or after what we have before us.⁷⁵

⁷⁴ The Greek reads ex ("from" or "out of"), which the Arabic translation renders as "in." On the latter interpretation the change is a change that occurs within one action; on the former, it is a change that grows out of one action and results in another. The overall sense is not so different, and one is tempted to translate "out of" to preserve the parallelism with the genitive in the previous sentence on simple actions. However that parallelism is already fractured by the change of verb. Simple actions are those of which the change comes to be without recognition or reversal; complex actions are those in/from which the action is with a recognition, reversal, or both. Translating ex by "in" preserves this distinction.

⁷⁵ This sentence is certainly perplexing. One expects a denial of the post hoc ergo propter hoc fallacy, and this is the way it is usually taken. See, for example, Lucas, 128, where it is likened to Rhetoric 1401b31 – to gar meta touto hōs dia touto lambanousin. Yet the dissimilarity of the passages is more striking than their similarity, for while in the Rhetoric Aristotle simply points to the error of taking "after this" to mean "because of this," here he says that the fact that tade (these things right in front of us) come

11.

What has been spoken of as the change into the contrary of the things being done is reversal, and this too, just as we say, according to the likely or necessary. For example, in the Oedipus, on his coming,⁷⁶ in supposing that he was going to cheer Oedipus and release him from the fear regarding his mother, once he had made it clear who he was, he did [epoiêsen] the contrary. And in the Lynceus,⁷⁷ the one being led as though to be put to death with Danaus following as though to kill him, it turned out as a result of the things that had already been enacted that the latter was killed and the former saved.

Recognition [anagnôrisis], on the other hand, just as the name too signifies, is a change from ignorance [agnoia] to knowledge [gnôsis], whether toward friendship or enmity, of those whose relation to good or ill fortune has already been defined. A recognition is most beautiful when it comes to be at the same time as a reversal, for example as it is in the Oedipus. Although there are also other sorts of recognition to be from tade differs from the fact that tade come to be after tade. The first tade is the problem, for it suggests that the same things are being spoken of throughout. One would have expected him to say that the fact that tade come to be from those (ekeina) differs from the fact that tade come to be after ekeina. The use of tade rather than tauta also emphasizes that these things that come to be come to be in relation to us. It seems, then, that Aristotle's expression is meant to recall, "That's him!" at 1448b18. On the two other occasions where dia tade occurs in Aristotle, touto precedes; meta tade occurs nowhere else. Plato has dia tade once and meta tade never.

⁷⁶ At Oedipus Tyrannus 1002, the same verb refers not to the messenger's action in coming to Thebes but to his interpretation of the meaning of the action.

⁷⁷ The Lynceus was written by Theodectes.

(for it is possible for recognition to occur in just the manner that has been stated in regard to both lifeless and chance things, and it is just as possible to recognize whether someone has acted or not acted), still, the one most characteristic of the story and most characteristic of action is the one previously mentioned,⁷⁸ for a recognition and reversal of this sort will have either pity or fear (we suppose tragedy to be an imitation of such actions), and misfortune or good fortune will be the result of actions of this sort as well. Since, in fact, recognition is recognition of some [men], some recognitions are only of one toward another (whenever it is clear who one of them is), but sometimes there must be a recognition of both, as, for example, Orestes recognized Iphigeneia from the sending of the letter, while Iphigeneia needed another sort of recognition of him.

35

1452b

5

These, then, are two parts of the story, reversal and recognition, and a third is suffering. Of these, reversal and recognition have been spoken of, but suffering is a destructive or painful action such as killings in the open, and the infliction of excessive pains and wounds and everything of this sort.

10

12.⁷⁹

We spoke before of the parts of tragedy which ought to be used as kinds, but these are the parts separated according to quantity and into which it is divided: prologue, episode, exodus, choral part⁸⁰ – and this into parodus and

15

⁷⁸ Literally, "the one having been said."

⁷⁹ Ritter and other editors have proposed the excision of this chapter.

⁸⁰ On the chorus see pseudo-Aristotle, Problemata 920a8-10 and 922b10-27 in Appendix 4 below.

stasimon. These are common to all, while choral parts from the stage and kommoi are peculiar to some. A prologue is a whole part of tragedy before the parodus of the chorus. An episode is a whole part of tragedy between whole choral songs. An exodus is a whole part of tragedy after which there is no choral song. Of the choral part, a parodus is the first whole talk of the chorus, a stasimon is a choral song without anapest or trochee, and a kommos is a lamentation common to the chorus and those on stage. We spoke before of the parts of tragedy which ought to be used as kinds, but these are the parts separated according to quantity and into which it is divided.⁸¹

20

25

13.

Following the things just now said, we have to speak next of what we should aim at and what we should beware of in putting together stories and on what basis tragedy will do its job. Since, then, the putting together of the most beautiful tragedy should be not simple but of a complex weave, and what is more it should be imitative of fearful and pitiable things (for this is peculiar to this sort of imitation), first, just as it is clear that the sound⁸² men ought not to be

30

⁸¹ This last sentence of the chapter is almost identical to the first with two exceptions; in the first sentence "these" is tade while in the last it is tauta, and Aristotle may have used different forms of the aorist for "we spoke," although the manuscripts differ here. If he did use two different forms Aristotle might well be imitating within the Attic dialect the combination of Attic and Doric dialects characteristic of choral odes. Throughout this chapter Aristotle uses meros to refer to the parts of tragedy. The divisions of tragedy in chapter six above are first introduced as meria - proper parts.

⁸² "Sound" translates epieikês. In Book 5 of the Nicomachean Ethics (1137a31-1138a3) it is the virtue that belongs to the one who is shown changing from good to bad fortune (for this is neither fearful nor pitiable but loathsome), so the wicked ought not to be shown changing from misfortune to good fortune (for this is the least tragic of all, since it has nothing of what it ought to have as it is neither productive of a feeling of kinship with the human⁸³ nor pitiable nor fearful) any more than the very evil man ought to appear to fall from good fortune to ill fortune (for, though a putting together of this sort would have the feeling of kinship with the human, still it would not have either pity or fear; for with respect to one who has ill fortune, the pity concerns his not deserving it, and the fear concerns his being similar to us, so that what occurs will be neither pitiable nor fearful⁸⁴). The one between these, then, is left. He who is neither distinguished by virtue and justice nor changing to bad fortune on account of vice and wickedness is of this sort, but one who changes on account of some mistake and is one of those in great repute and of good fortune such as Oedipus, Thyestes, and notable men of families of this sort.

more just than justice, for he sees where the general rules of justice embodied in the law fall short in every particular case. The epieikês is thus the man of equity. As one who in principle never errs, he ought never to suffer for making mistakes. He is thus especially unlike the man whom Aristotle praises for feeling shame (aidôs) in Book 4 (1128b10-36) but only conditionally. Shame is not a virtue, for it presupposes either that one has made a mistake or could make a mistake that justifies one's shame.

⁸³ The Greek is philanthrôpon. Aristotle discusses it once in the Nicomachean Ethics (1155a20) in the context of a discussion of friendship or philia.

⁸⁴ The sense is that we pity those who suffer undeservedly. However Aristotle's language is a little odd here; in another context the clause might mean that he intends to discuss those who are unworthy (anaxios) and suffer a bad fate.

It is necessary, then, for the beautiful story to be simple rather than, as some say, double and to change not to good fortune from bad fortune but the opposite, from good fortune to bad fortune, not because of wickedness but because of a great mistake either of one such as has been said or of one better rather than worse. And what happens is even a sign of this, for at first poets were tellers of stories of any sort, but now the most beautiful tragedies are put together about a few families, such as about Alcmeon, Oedipus, Orestes, Meleager, Thyestes, Telephus, and about everyone else to whom it has fallen either to suffer or do (poiêsai) terrible things.

Now, the most beautiful tragedy according to art is from this sort of putting together. Hence also those who accuse Euripides make the same mistake in saying that he does this in his tragedies, and many of them do end in bad fortune. For what he does is right as it has been stated. And there is the greatest sign of this, for on stage and in the contests, those of this sort, if rightly done, appear most tragic, and Euripides, even if he does not manage the rest well, yet he appears still the most tragic of the poets. The second, on the other hand, is the putting together which some say to be first. It has the double putting-together, like the Odyssey, and ends contrariwise for the better and the worse. It seems to be first because of the weakness of the spectators. For the poets follow the spectators, making their poetry as they would pray for things to be.⁸⁵ But this is not a pleasure of tragedy but is rather proper to comedy, where those who are the greatest of enemies in the story, for example, Orestes and Aegisthus, having become friends, go off at the end, and no one is killed by anyone.

⁸⁵ Compare Politics 1288b23.

14.

1453b

Although it is possible for the fearful and the pitiable to come to be from opsis, still it is also possible from the mere putting together of the events. This is prior and characterizes the better poet. For the story must have been put together in such a way that, even without seeing, he who hears the events as they come to be shudders and pities from what occurs. This is what one would experience on hearing the story of the Oedipus. To provide for this through opsis is less artful and requires a subsidy. Those who do not produce through opsis the fearful but only the monstrous have nothing in common with tragedy, for one should not seek every pleasure from tragedy but what is proper to it. And, since the poet should produce the pleasure from pity and fear through imitation, it is apparent that a place must be made for this in the events. Let us then take up what sort of occurrences appear terrible and what sort piteous.⁸⁶ It is surely necessary that actions of this sort be in the relation of friends toward one another, or of enemies, or of neither. Should it be enemy toward enemy, he is neither doing nor intending anything piteous except by virtue of the suffering itself, any more than if they are neither friends nor enemies. But the sufferings to be sought are these: whenever they come to be in friendships, such as if brother should either kill or intend to kill or do something else of this sort to brother, or son to father, or mother to son, or son to mother. The stories that have been handed down, then, are not to be loosened; I mean, for example, the killing of Clytaemestra by Orestes and of Eriphyle by Alcmeon, but he should be inventive on his own and use

5

10

15

20

25

⁸⁶ See Rhetoric 1382a20-1383a12 and 1385b11-1386b7 in Appendix 3 below.

these hand-me-downs beautifully. But let us say what we mean more clearly by "beautifully." Just as it is possible for the action to come to be in just the way the ancients made it [epoiooun], knowingly and with cognizance, and as Euripides made [epoiêsen] Medea kill her children, so it is also possible to act [praxai], and, being ignorant, to do [praxai] what is terrible and then afterward to recognize the friendship, just like Sophocles' Oedipus. Now this is outside the drama [drama], but it can be in the tragedy itself, such as Astydamos' Alcmeon or Telegonus in the Wounded Odysseus.⁸⁷ And further, a third besides these is to intend to do [poiein] something beyond cure because of ignorance but to recognize before doing it [poiêsai]. And besides these it is not possible in a different way. For it is necessary either to act [praxai] or not and knowingly or not knowingly. Of these, to intend while cognizant and not to act [praxai] is worst, for it is loathsome and not tragic, since it is without suffering. Therefore no one makes it like this, unless rarely, such as, in Antigone, Haemon toward Creon. Second is to act [praxai], but it is better for the ignorant to act and, having acted, to recognize. For the loathsome is not attached to it, and the recognition is astounding. But the strongest is the last; I mean, for example, in the Cresphontes,⁸⁸ Merope intends to kill her son and does not kill him but recognizes him, and, in the Iphigeneia,⁸⁹ the sister goes through this with her brother, and, in the Helle, the son, intending to betray his mother, recognizes her. Because of this, as was said some time ago, tragedies are not about many families. For in seeking, they discovered not by art but by chance.

⁸⁷ The Wounded Odysseus is a lost play by Sophocles.

⁸⁸ The Cresphontes is a lost play by Euripides.

⁸⁹ Euripides' Iphigeneia among the Taurians.

how to produce this sort of thing in their stories. They are compelled, then, to have recourse to those families in which sufferings of this sort have occurred. Now, it has been adequately stated about the putting together of events and what sorts the stories should be.

15

15.

On the other hand, there are four things concerning characters at which one should aim – one and first that they be good.⁹⁰ There will be character if, on the one hand, the speech or the action, as was said, makes apparent some choice, whatever it is, and the character will be good if the speech or the action makes clear that the choice is good. On the other hand, “good” is dependent on the class⁹¹ in which it is. For example, a woman is good and a slave is good, yet perhaps of these one is worse and the other altogether inferior. Second is that characters be fitting. For it is possible for a character to be manly, but it is not fitting for a woman to be manly in that way or to be terrifying.⁹² And third is that character be similar, for this is quite another

20

25

⁹⁰ The word translated as “good” is chrēsta. It is cognate with the verb “to use” and always retains a hint of the good as the useful. It is the word Aristotle uses throughout this chapter. Chrēstos occurs once in the Nicomachean Ethics (1146a13) of desires, and twice in the Eudemian Ethics, but eleven times in the Rhetoric and five times in the Politics (in Plato chrēstos occurs some 100 times). Consider Rhetoric 1395b13–17: “All speeches have character in which the choice is clear. All sentiments [gnōmai] do this because the speaker of a general sentiment makes a declaration about his choices, so that, if the opinions are good [chrēstai], they make the speaker appear to have a good character [chrestoēthē].”

⁹¹ “Class” translates genos, elsewhere translated as either “family” or “genus.”

⁹² “Terrifying” translates deinos, which may also mean “clever.”

thing from what was said before about making the character good and fitting. And fourth that character be consistent. For even if the one who offers himself for imitation is inconsistent and a character of this sort is presupposed, nevertheless he should be consistently inconsistent. A model of unnecessary evilness of character is like Menelaus in the Orestes,⁹³ of the unsuitable and unfitting the lamentation of Odysseus in the *Scylla*⁹⁴ or the declamation of Melanippe,⁹⁵ and of the inconsistent the Iphigeneia at Aulis,⁹⁶ for she who supplicates is not at all like who she is later.

Similarly, one must always seek in characters, just as one also must in the putting together of events, either the necessary or the likely so that it is either necessary or likely for him who is of a certain sort to speak or do things of that sort, and it is either necessary or likely for this to come to be after that. It is apparent, then, that even the unravelings ⁹³ The play is by Euripides.

⁹⁴ Neither the play nor the author is known.

⁹⁵ This seems to allude to Euripides' Melanippe the Wise fragment 484 (Nauck): "The tale is not mine, but from my mother: Sky and Earth were once one shape, but when they separated from one another, they gave birth to all things and put them into the light – trees, birds, the beasts the sea supports, and the race of mortals." Another possibility is fragment 506 (Nauck), which may be from the same play, but with Melanippe speaking: "Do you imagine that injustices leap with wings to the gods, and then someone writes them down in the leaves of the tablet of Zeus, and Zeus, on inspecting them, passes judgment [justice] on mortals? Not even the whole sky would suffice were Zeus to write up the mistakes of mortals, any more than he could, by inspection, send the penalty to each, but Justice [Dikē] is somewhere hereabouts, if you want to look."

⁹⁶ The play is by Euripides.

30

35

of stories should occur from the story itself, and not, as in the Medea, from a contrivance⁹⁷ or in the Iliad the events surrounding the sailing away.⁹⁸ But contrivance ought to be used for things outside the drama, either whatever had come to be before that a human being cannot know, or whatever comes to be later which requires foretelling and report. For we assign it to the gods to see everything. And nothing irrational⁹⁹ should be in the events, but if there is, it should be outside of the tragedy, such as in Sophocles' Oedipus. Since tragedy is an imitation of those who are better than we, one ought to imitate the good image-painters.¹⁰⁰ For, in rendering the individual shape, they make them similar to it, but they paint them to be more

⁹⁷ In general, the word mêchanê means "contrivance," but in tragedy it has the more specialized meaning of a cranelike device used to lift gods into a scene from above — our deus ex machina. The reference is to Medea's escape on such a contrivance on her way to Athens.

⁹⁸ "Sailing away" might also be rendered "voyage back"; Aristotle refers here to the intervention of Athena in Iliad Book 2 after Agamemnon's speech has been misunderstood by the army, and they scatter to their ships.

⁹⁹ The word is alogos; literally it means "without speech" or "unspeakable."

¹⁰⁰ Homer's description of Agamemnon after the marshalling of the troops (Iliad 2.478-9) — "He was in his glance and head like Zeus who twists the thunderbolt, in his waist like Ares, and his chest like Poseidon" — has this comment in the T Scholiast: "Painters pursue the truth, the tragic poets the more august, and the comic poets the less; all three are present in the poet, comedy in the case of Thersites, painting in 'Automedon held the meat for him and then glorious Achilles cut it' (Iliad 9. 209), and now in the case of Agamemnon his appearance has been fashioned to be more beautiful than the truth and more magnificent."

beautiful. So also, the poet, in imitating the irascible and the easy-going and those who have in point of character other traits of this sort, must in making them of that sort make them sound, just as Homer made Achilles good and the paradigm of cruelty.¹⁰¹ These things should be closely observed and, besides these, the visualization¹⁰² that necessarily attends poetics. For it is often possible to make a mistake in regard to this. But enough has been said about this in published accounts [logois].

15

16.

What recognition is has been spoken of before, but there are kinds of recognition – first, the least artful, which is an account of an impasse they use most, the one through signs. And of these some are natural such as “the spear which the Earthborn bear” or the stars such as Carcinus made in the Thyestes,¹⁰³ others are acquired, and of these some are on the body, such as scars, while others are external to it, such as necklaces and such as in the recognition through the cradle in the Tyro.¹⁰⁴ But it is possible to use any of these either better or worse. For example, Odysseus

20

25

We have accepted Lobel's emendation transposing agathon kai at 1454b14. The scholium on Iliad 24.569 says that Aristotle asserted in his Homeric Questions that the character of Achilles was inconsistent (fragment 24 [149] Rose).

Literally “perceptions” [aisthêseis] (as in the following two sentences “this” is literally “these”). It is plural and includes not only what we see but also what we hear; of course we mean this as well when we say that we visualize the action of a work of fiction.

The Earthborn had a birthmark in the shape of a spear. Carcinus's Thyestes is possibly the same as his Aërope.

Sophocles wrote two plays called Tyro. There is a parody of the recognition in Aristophanes' Lysistrata (138): “It's no wonder that tragedies are from us (women), for we are nothing but was recognized through the scar in one way by the nurse and in another by the swineherds.¹⁰⁵ For all recognitions of the latter sort, those for the sake of ensuring belief are less artful, and all from signs are of this sort, but those that result from reversal, like the one in the Bath Scene, are better. Second are those the poet has made up, which are therefore artless. For example, Orestes in the Iphigeneia arranged for his recognition as Orestes, for she recognized him through the letter, yet he himself says what the poet wants but not what the story wants. Therefore it is something close to the aforesaid mistake, for it would have been possible for him to bring something.¹⁰⁶ Also in Sophocles' Tereus there is the "voice of the shuttle."¹⁰⁷ The third is through memory, by the awareness that one has seen something, just like the recognition in Dicaeogenes' Cyprians, for when he saw the painting he burst into tears, and the one in the "tale of Alcinous"¹⁰⁸ for, hearing the lyre player and remembering, Odysseus wept, from which they made themselves be recognized. Fourth is the recognition by figuring out, such as in the Libation Bearers: "Someone similar Poseidon and cradles" (i.e., women are good for nothing except sex and birth). Poseidon was the father of Tyro's twin sons.

¹⁰⁵ See Odyssey 19.386-502 for the nurse's recognition of Odysseus and 21.205-25 where Odysseus is recognized by Eumaeus, the swineherd, and Philoitiis, the cowherd.

¹⁰⁶ See Euripides' Iphigeneia among the Taurians 727-830.

¹⁰⁷ The words seem to be a quotation. They refer, in any case, to the picture that Procne's sister, Philomela, wove or embroidered in which she depicted her rape by Tereus, Procne's husband.

¹⁰⁸ This phrase designates Books 9-12 of the Odyssey, in which Odysseus tells Alcinous about his travels (Plato, Republic 614b2; Aristotle, Rhetoric, 1417a14). Odysseus weeps at Odyssey 8.521-22, and this prompts Alcinous to ask him who he is.

s come, and no one is similar other than Orestes, so he s come after all."¹⁰⁹ And there is the recognition proposed by Polyidos the sophist about the Iphigeneia, for it is likely, he said, for Orestes to figure out that just as his ter was sacrificed, so it was also his lot to be sacrificed.
 and in Theodectes' Tydeus, he figures out that by coming to and his son he himself is destroyed. And also in the ineidae, for seeing the place, they figured out their fate, at in this place it was fated for them to die, for here also re they exposed. There is also a recognition put together from misreasoning of the audience,¹¹⁰ such as in Odysseus False Messenger.¹¹¹ But the best recognition of all is the e from the events themselves when the astounding comes be through the likely such as in Sophocles' Oedipus and the Iphigeneia; for it is likely to wish to send writings.
 ily those of this sort, then, are without made-up signs
 f necklaces. But second are those from figuring out.

10

15

20

17.

As much as possible one should put stories before one's s while putting them together and working them out ething with the talk. For if one does this one would see st vividly, just as though one were among the actions mselves as they were being done, and would discover at is appropriate, and one would least fail to notice

25

See Aeschylus, Libation Bearers, 168–212.

Following Hermann, some commentators read thateron – “of the other” – rather than theatron; the misreasoning would then be of one of the characters in the play rather than of the audience.

We have omitted four lines here, two of which are present in only one manuscript. In neither case is the text translatable.
 Aristotle must have given an explanation of the false reasoning in the play.

incongruities. A sign of this is what Carcinus was criticized for. For Amphiaros was returning from the temple, which Carcinus failed to notice because he was not "looking" at it,¹¹² but on stage, it flopped because it annoyed the spectators. To whatever extent possible one must work it out with the gestures¹¹³ as well, for those in the grip of experiences¹¹⁴ on the basis of their own nature are the most persuasive,¹¹⁵ and he who is under the stress of a storm induces storm stress, and he who is angry induces anger most genuinely. Therefore poetics belongs either to one with a good nature or to a madman, for of these, the former easily take any shape¹¹⁶ and the latter are not themselves.

Regardless of whether they have already been made or he himself is making them, he must set forth accounts [logos] in general and then, on this basis, add episodes and stretch them out. And I mean [legō] the general would be contemplated in this way, for example of the Iphigeneia: A girl is sacrificed, disappears in a way that is not clear to those who sacrificed her, gets settled in another country in which it was the law to sacrifice strangers to the goddess, and she gets this priesthood. Later in time it happens that the brother of the priestess came, but that the god declared that he should go there for some cause is outside the general, 112 We follow Butcher in omitting ton theatōn; Carcinus then becomes the understood subject.

113 "Gestures" translates schēmata, elsewhere translated as "characteristic shape."

114 Pathē is elsewhere translated as "sufferings."

115 Most editors read "on the basis of the same nature" and interpret it as saying that if two poets have the same nature, the one who duplicates the passion is more persuasive.

116 Or "easily mold themselves." For the relation between the poet and the madman, see Plato's Ion 535b-e.

and for what purpose he was to go there is outside the story. But on his arrival he was caught, and being about to be sacrificed, he made himself recognized (whether in Euripides' way or as Polyidos made it up in saying according to the likely that it was as it should be that not only his sister be sacrificed but also he himself), and from the recognition he was saved. It is after this that the poet must insert the names and make up the episodes, and he must make sure that the episodes are appropriate, for example in the case of Orestes, the madness through which he was caught and his being saved¹¹⁷ through the cleansing.¹¹⁸

10

15

Now, in dramas the episodes are concise, but in epic poetry they are lengthened. For example, the account [logos] of the Odyssey is not long: Someone is abroad for many years, watched by Poseidon,¹¹⁹ and he is alone, and further, the affairs at home are such that his goods are being used up by suitors and his son plotted against; having suffered through storms, he returns. After he makes himself recognized to some, on launching an attack, he himself is saved, and he destroys his enemies. This is peculiar to it; the rest are episodes.

20

¹¹⁷ In the play, Orestes is saved from being killed by way of a ruse that involves carrying a statue of Artemis down to the sea to be cleansed. However, the Greek sôtêria could also mean "restoration." This reading would allude to Orestes' restoration from madness.

¹¹⁸ Aristotle strangely omits the facts that Agamemnon sacrificed his daughter for the sake of the recovery of Helen, that Orestes killed his mother to avenge her killing of Agamemnon, and that Orestes' subsequent madness is caused by the pursuit of the furies.

¹¹⁹ Vahlen suggests replacing "Poseidon" with "the god," Ellebodius with "some god."

18.

Of every tragedy there is an entanglement¹²⁰ and an unraveling,¹²¹ the things outside and often some of those within being the entanglement and the remainder the unraveling. And I mean [legô] the entanglement to be what is from the beginning until that part which is an extreme from which it changes into good fortune or misfortune, and by unraveling what is from the beginning of the change until the end. So in the Lynceus of Theodectes the entanglement is both the actions done before and the seizing of the little child and again . . . but what is from the indictment for the death until the end is the unraveling.¹²² There are four kinds of tragedy (for the parts also were said to be this many): the complex, of which the whole is reversal and recognition; the tragedy of suffering, such as both the Ajaxes and Ixions; that of character, such as the *Women of Phthia*¹²³ and the Peleus,¹²⁴ and the fourth . . . such as the Daughters of Phorcus,¹²⁵ Prometheus, and whichever are in Hades.¹²⁶ Now, in the best possible case one should try to

25

30

1456a

¹²⁰ "Entanglement" is desis; it could also be translated "tying," "binding up," or "complication."

¹²¹ "Unraveling" is lisis, from the verb luô, to loosen or free; it also has the sense of resolving, and later in the text even of analysis. In chapters 25 and 26 it will be translated as "solution."

¹²² The text is corrupt.

¹²³ A play by Sophocles.

¹²⁴ Sophocles and Euripides each wrote a Peleus.

¹²⁵ A satyr play by Aeschylus.

¹²⁶ The text is corrupt. The fourth kind of tragedy is indicated by the three letters oês. Bywater suggests opsis, Vahlen, the monstrous. See, however, 1459b8-9, which seems to indicate that the fourth kind is the simple.

have all, but if not, the most important and as many as possible, especially since people unfairly criticize the poets as they do now. For there have been poets good at each part, but they claim that one poet ought to surpass the good that is peculiar to each. But it is just to speak of a tragedy as the same as or different from another by nothing so much as by story, those being the same of which the weaving and the unraveling are the same.¹²⁷ But many, while weaving well, unravel badly. Yet both should be set in unison. And one has to remember what has often been said and not make a composition that is characteristic of epic poetry into a tragedy. I mean [legō] by epic poetry what is multistoried) just as if someone were to make the whole story of the Iliad into a tragedy. For there, because of its length, the parts assume their fitting magnitude, but in dramas the parts are out of line with this assumption. A sign of this is that all who made a tragedy of the whole sack of Ilium, and not by parts like Euripides, or of the whole of what happened to Niobe, and not like Aeschylus, either fail or do badly in competition, since even Agathon failed in this way alone. But in reversals and in simple events, they hit the mark they want wonderfully, for this is tragic and has a kinship with the human, and this occurs when the wise man with evil in him is deceived, like Sisyphus, or the courageous but unjust man is worsted. And this too is likely, for, as Agathon says, it is

5

10

15

20

¹²⁷ The argument here is so elliptical that Bywater suggests rearranging the order of paragraphs. Aristotle wants to prove again that the story is the most important of the parts of tragedy, this time on the basis of its new division between entanglement and unraveling. The digression on the four kinds of tragedy indicates a certain concession to those who are critical of the modern poets, but still, for Aristotle this is not the decisive issue; hence the criticisms are unjust.

likely that many things come to be that are contrary to the likely. The chorus should be understood as one of the performers, also as a proper part of the whole and sharing in the competition, not as in Euripides, but as in Sophocles. In the rest of the poets the singing no more belongs to the story than to another tragedy. Therefore, the singing is just thrown in; Agathon was the first to begin this sort of practice. However, what is the difference between throwing in singing and fitting a declamation or a whole episode from one thing into another?

25

30

19.

About all the other kinds we have already spoken, but it remains to speak about talk and thought. Let the things about thought be those established in the writings about rhetoric, for this is more particular to that way of inquiry. Those things fall under thought which are to be produced by speech. The parts of these are proving, disproving,¹²⁸ and the producing of passions¹²⁹ (such as pity, fear, or anger, and all that are of this sort) and further aggrandizing and belittlings. And it is clear that one should make use of the same forms in the events as well whenever one ought to produce pitiful things, terrible things, great things, or likely things, except that it differs in this way, that the one should be made apparent without being didactic, while the other should be produced in speech by the speaker and should come to be as a consequence of the speech. For what otherwise would be the job of the speaker if things appeared as they should and yet not on account of his

35

1456b

5

¹²⁸ The word is the infinitive luem, elsewhere translated as "to unravel" or "to solve."

¹²⁹ Pathê is elsewhere translated as "sufferings."

peech? Of the things that pertain to talk, the figures of talk re one kind of theoretical understanding, for example:
 What is a command? and What is a prayer? and a narration, threat, a question, and an answer, as well as anything else f this sort. This is for the art of performing to know and or the one having an architectonic art of this sort. For with ie knowledge or ignorance of these, no criticism worth rious consideration applies to poetics.¹³⁰ For why should ne assume that the mistake that Protagoras criticizes has een made – that in believing that he prays, [Homer] issues command when he says “Sing goddess the wrath . . .”? For is Protagoras who says bidding to do or not is a com-and. Therefore, let it be passed over as a matter of theoetical understanding belonging to a different art and not to oetics.

10

15

20.

20.

The parts of all talk are as follows: letter,¹³¹ syllable, nnective, noun,¹³² verb, joint, deviation, speech. A letter, en, is an indivisible sound, although not every one but at out of which a sound comes to be put together by ture. For there are also indivisible sounds of beasts none which I speak of as a letter. Its parts are the vowel,¹³³ the mi-vowel,¹³⁴ and the mute.¹³⁵ A vowel is an audible sound

25

Aristotle often distinguishes between the theoretical sciences (first philosophy or theology, mathematics, and physics) and the practical (ethics and politics), and the productive arts (poiêtikai).

Stoicheion also means “element.”

Onoma may also mean “name” or “word.” It will be used in the latter sense at the outset of the next chapter (1457a31).

Literally “the sounded.”

Literally “the half-sounded.”

Literally “the non-sounded.”

without the application [of the tongue to the mouth], while a semi-vowel is an audible sound with an application, such as the σ and the ρ , and a mute is with application, though it has no sound by itself, but becomes audible if it is with those having any sound, such as the γ and the δ . And these differ by virtue of the shapings of the mouth and locations, and by roughness and smoothness, and by length and shortness, and by the acute, grave, and intermediate. But to understand theoretically these things one by one is appropriate to the art of metrics. A syllable is a sound without significance put together from a mute and something having sound. For example, $\gamma\rho$ without the α is a syllable, as well as with the α , i.e., $\gamma\rho\alpha$. But to understand the differences of these things theoretically also belongs to the art of metrics. A connective is a sound without significance which neither hinders nor makes one significant sound from being put together naturally out of many sounds both at the ends and in the middle, but which it is not fitting to put on its own at the beginning of a speech, for example men, êtoi, and de. Or it is a sound without significance which from many single significant sounds naturally makes one significant sound. A joint is a sound without significance which makes clear a beginning, end, or division of a speech, for example, amphi (around), peri (about), and the rest. Or it is a sound without significance which neither hinders nor makes one significant sound out of many sounds and is by nature put at the ends and at the middle. A noun is a put-together, significant sound without time, no part of which is significant in itself; for in doubled nouns we do not use a part as also itself significant in terms of itself. For example, in Theodoros (god's gift) the "doros" is not significant.¹³⁶ A verb is a put-together, significant sound with time, no part

30

35

1457a

5

10

15

¹³⁶ Compare Aristotle, de interpretatione 16a19-21: "A noun is a sig-

of which is significant in itself, just as also with nouns. For "human being" or "white" do not signify at what time, but "[he] walks" signifies in addition present time and "[he] has walked" signifies past time. Deviation is of a noun or a verb. One is with respect to the signifying of a thing, or to a thing, and however many things of this sort there are, and another is with respect to one or many, such as "human beings" or "human being," and third with respect to the things of performance, such as a question or a command. For "Did [he] walk?" or "Walk!" is a deviation of a verb with respect to these kinds. A speech is a put-together significant sound, some parts of which in themselves signify something, for not every speech has been put together from nouns and verbs, for example "the definition of human being," so it is possible for there to be a speech without verbs.¹³⁷ Yet it always has a part signifying something, such as "Cleon" in "Cleon walks." And speech is one in two ways - either by signifying one thing or as a connection from several. For example, the Iliad is one by connection, but the definition¹³⁸ of human being by signifying one thing.

21.

The kinds of word¹³⁹ are the simple (by simple I mean

nificant sound by way of being put together, no part of which is significant if it is apart, for in Kalippos, hippos signifies nothing by itself, as it does in kalos hippos [beautiful horse]."

⁷ Compare Aristotle, de interpretatione 16b26-29: "A speech is a put together significant sound, of which any of the parts is significant if separated, but as an utterance (phasis), not as an assertion (kataphasis). I mean, for example, "man" signifies something, but not that he is or is not."

Following the Latin translation, we read horismos here, but even were one to supply logos the translation would read the same.

The Greek is onoma.

what has not been put together out of words signifying something, such as *gê*¹⁴⁰) and the double. Of the latter, some have been put together out of a signifying word and a non-signifying word (except not out of a signifying [word] and non-signifying [word] in the word [put together]), and some have been put together out of signifying words. And there would also be a triple and a quadruple and a many-fold word, such as many words of the Massiliots, for example, Hermokaikoxanthos.¹⁴¹ Every word is either ordinary, foreign, metaphor, ornament,¹⁴² made-up, lengthened, shortened, or altered. I say ordinary to be what everyone uses, but foreign what others use; so that it is apparent that it is possible for the same word to be both ordinary and foreign, although not to the same people. For to the Cyprians, sigunon (spear) is ordinary, but to us foreign.¹⁴³ Metaphor is the application of a word belonging to something else either from the genus [genos] to a species [eidōs], or from the species to the genus, or from the species to a species, or according to analogy.¹⁴⁴

¹⁴⁰ Gê is "earth."

¹⁴¹ This probably names a river; it consists of three proper names: Hermos, Kaikos, and Xanthos. There is a gap in the text here. From the Arabic "in-a-prayer-to-Zeus" has been restored as another many-fold word.

¹⁴² The Greek is kosmos.

¹⁴³ Herodotus remarks that a tribe dwelling north of the Massiliots call retailers sigunmai, but the Cyprians use it for spears (5.9.3).

¹⁴⁴ See also Aristotle, Topics 140a6-17: "Some things have been spoken of neither by way of homonymy, metaphor, nor common usage, for example, 'The law is the measure or image of the things just by nature.' Things of this sort are worse than metaphor. For metaphor makes what is signified somehow familiar on account of the likeness (for everyone in making metaphors does so in conformity with some similarity), but this sort of thing does not make it familiar, for just as there is no similarity in accordance with which law is either a measure or an image, so it is not usually said. Hence if one says by way of common usage that law is a measure or an image, he is deceived (for an image is that whose genesis is through imitation, and this is not characteristic of law); but if it is not by common usage, it is clear that one has spoken obscurely and in a way worse than anything said metaphorically." Aristotle seems to allude to Plato's Statesman 293e and 300c-e, where the Eleatic Stranger says that the six defective regimes (three law-abiding and three not) are all imitations of the one right regime, and that the laws and writings of knowers in each field are a second sailing and imitations of the truth.

By from genus to species I mean, for example, "my ship stands here,"¹⁴⁵ for to be at anchor is a sort of standing. And from species to genus: "Surely Odysseus has done ten thousand good things."¹⁴⁶ For ten thousand is many and in this place it has been used instead of many. And from species to species: for example, "drawing off the soul with bronze" and "cutting with long-edged bronze."¹⁴⁷ For here "to draw off" has expressed "to cut," and "to cut" "to draw off." For both are a taking away. By analogy, I mean when the second is to the first as the fourth to the third. For instead of the second one will say the fourth, or instead of the fourth the second. And sometimes they add instead of what it says what is related to it. I mean, for example, a cup is to Dionysus as a shield to Ares. Then one will say that the cup is the shield of Dionysus and the shield the cup of Ares.¹⁴⁸

¹⁴⁵ Odyssey 1.185. Athena, in disguise, is telling a false story about herself.

¹⁴⁶ Iliad 2.272. The common soldiers are commenting on Odysseus's beating of Thersites.

¹⁴⁷ These two are from Empedocles, fragments 138 and 143 in Diels, H. and Kranz, W., Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker (Berlin: 1954).

¹⁴⁸ See Timotheus fragment 2 (Page) from his Persae.

Or, old age is to life as evening to day; then one will say evening to be the old age of day as Empedocles does,¹⁴⁹ and old age to be the evening of life, or the sunset of life. For some of the analogies there is no word laid down, yet the similitude will be said nonetheless. For example, to scatter seed is to sow, while the scattering of the flame of the sun is nameless. But this is to the sun as sowing is to the seed, from which is said "sowing the god-made flame."¹⁵⁰ But it is possible to use this manner of metaphor also in a different way, to deny in one's designation of something that what is alien to it is one of its properties, for example, if one should say the shield is the cup not of Ares but wineless.¹⁵¹ A made-up word is what, although generally not called so by anyone, the poet himself posits; for some seem to be of this sort; for example, horns are called branchings and a priest a pray-er.¹⁵² And a word is lengthened or shortened, the former if one uses a longer vowel than is proper or an inserted syllable, the latter if any of it is shortened, lengthening, for example, poleôs [of the city] to polêos and Pêleidou [of the offspring of Peleus] to Pêlêladeô, and shortening, for example, kri [barley] and dô [house] and "one ops [sight] comes to be from both [eyes]."¹⁵³ And it is altered when of the thing named he leaves part and makes up part, such as

25

30

35

1458a

5

¹⁴⁹ Fragment 152, Diels-Kranz, Vorsokratiker.

¹⁵⁰ Fragment of an unknown tragic or lyric poet.

¹⁵¹ Modius posited a lacuna here to account for the lack of explication of ornament.

¹⁵² The word is arêtêra; it is what Chryses is called at the outset of the Iliad (1.11). The suffix têr means that Chryses is a priest whose profession it is to pray on behalf of the people.

¹⁵³ The word shortened is opsis. The quotation is from Empedocles (fragment 88); it is quoted by Strabo.

"on the right [dexiteron] breast"¹⁵⁴ instead of "right" [dexion].

Of nouns¹⁵⁵ themselves, some are masculine, some feminine, and some in between. Those are masculine that end in ν , ρ , or σ , all that have been put together out of σ (these are two, ψ and ξ ¹⁵⁶), are masculine. And whichever end in those of the vowels that are always long, such as in η or ω , or, of those lengthened, in α , are feminine. So that those in which masculine and feminine end happen to be equal in number, for ψ and ξ are combined [with σ]. No noun ends in a mute or in a short vowel. But only three end in ι – meli, kommi, and peperi – and five in ν . And the in between¹⁵⁷ end in these and in ν and σ .¹⁵⁸

22.

It is a virtue of talk to be clear and not low. That from ordinary words is thus clearest but low (the poiêsis of Cleophon is an example and that of Sthenelus), while the use of alien words is august and alters the idiomatic. I mean by alien the foreign, metaphor, the lengthened, and everything beyond the ordinary. But, were someone to make everything of this sort, it would be either an enigma or a barbarism, an enigma if out of metaphors and a barbarism if out of foreign words. For this is the form of an enigma: while speaking of things that exist to join them together in impossible ways. One cannot do this in putting together

¹⁵⁴ Iliad 5.393. Dione consoles Aphrodite for the wound inflicted on her, saying that Heracles once hit Hera on the right breast.

¹⁵⁵ The Greek is onomatôn.

¹⁵⁶ ψ is $\pi + \sigma$, and ξ is $\kappa + \sigma$.

¹⁵⁷ The neuters.

¹⁵⁸ Ritter brackets the final paragraph.

other words, but in putting together metaphors it is possible, for example, "I saw a man who welded bronze on a man with fire."¹⁵⁹ and things of this sort. But when they are from foreign words, it is a barbarism. There ought to be, somehow, a blending of these. For, on the one hand, the non-idiomatic will make it not low, for example, the foreign, metaphor, ornament, and the other species [eidê] mentioned, and, on the other hand, the ordinary will make for clarity. The lengthenings, shortenings, and alterings of words contribute not the least part to the combination of clarity of talk with the non-idiomatic. For because of the occurrence of the unusual and its difference from ordinary talk, they will make for the non-idiomatic, but, because they share in the usual, there will be clarity. So that those do not rightly find fault who criticize this sort of talking and make fun of the poet, as did Eucleides the old,¹⁶⁰ saying that it is easy to make poetry if one is allowed to lengthen to whatever extent one wishes. He made a lampoon in this very style of talk: "I saw Epichares walking toward Marathon."¹⁶¹ For, although it is laughable for it to be evident in any way that one is using this manner, still due measure [metron] is common to all of the parts. For, if one should use metaphors, foreign words, and the other species [eidê] inappropriately and deliberately to raise a laugh, one would accomplish the same thing. Observe what a great difference the fitting makes if in the case of epic verse ordinary words

30

1458b

5

10

15

¹⁵⁹ An enigma of Cleobulina. Aristotle cites it at Rhetoric 1405a34-b3. See Appendix 3 below.

¹⁶⁰ The identity of this Eucleides is not known.

¹⁶¹ The Greek is Epicharên eidon Marathônade badizonta. For it to scan in dactylic hexameter, the initial epsilon and the initial alpha in the last word would have to be lengthened. Aristotle adds a second example, but the text is too corrupt to translate.

are inserted into the meter [metron]. Anyone replacing ordinary words with foreign words or metaphors or any other form would see that we speak truly. For example, Euripides made the same iamb as Aeschylus, replacing only one word, a foreign word instead of an ordinary and usual word; the one appeared beautiful, the other cheap. For Aeschylus in the Philoctetes made the line, "the ulcer which eats the flesh of my foot," while instead of "eats" Euripides has replaced it with "feasts upon."¹⁶² And "being little, good for nothing and unseemly, [he blinded]," if someone replacing this should say ordinary words, "being now small, weak, and unattractive, [he blinded],"¹⁶³ or replacing "he put down an unseemly chair and a little table" should say "he put down a wretched chair and a small table,"¹⁶⁴ or replacing "the shore roars"¹⁶⁵ should say "the shore cries out."¹⁶⁶ Further-

¹⁶² In fairness to Aeschylus, the verb esthiein, "to eat" or "to consume," is not used by Homer of human eating in the Iliad while the war is being waged until the last book, where Priam eats with Achilles; hence, Aeschylus esthiein is more strange or foreign than it looks. The verb thoinô, "to feast," does not in itself imply the act of eating. Aeschylus had used it for Prometheus' liver being feasted on by an eagle (Prometheus 1025) and Herodotus for the banquet Astyages makes of Harpagus's son (1.129.1).

¹⁶³ The quotation is from Odyssey 9.515; the context is Odysseus's blinding of the Cyclops. Aristotle's example involves replacing little (oligos) by small (mikros), good for nothing (outidanos) by weak (asthenikos), and unseemly (aeikês) by unattractive (aeidês). Our manuscript tradition has feeble (akikus) instead of aeikês, which in the context would have been much more suitable.

¹⁶⁴ The quotation is from Odyssey 20.259. Aristotle's example involves replacing unseemly (aeikelion) by wretched (mochtbêron) and little (oligên) by small (micran).

¹⁶⁵ The quotation is from Iliad 17.265.

¹⁶⁶ The verb krazein is uncommon in the present tense; it occurs as the expressive perfect kekragenai mostly in poetry.

more, Aripbrates used to make fun of the tragedians because they make use of what no one would say in conversation, such as "from the house away" but not "away from the house," "thine," "and I him,"¹⁶⁷ "Achilles about" but not "about Achilles," and other things of this sort. For all things of this sort make for the non-idiomatic in talk because they are out of the ordinary. But he was ignorant of this. To use each of the things mentioned appropriately is a great thing, as well as using double and foreign words, but much the greatest is the metaphorical. For, just as it alone is not to be taken from another, so it is a sign of a good nature; for to make metaphors well is to contemplate what is like.¹⁶⁸ Of words, the double are especially fitting to dithyrambs, the foreign to heroic hexameter, and metaphors to iambs. All the things mentioned are also useful in heroic hexameter, but in iambs, because of the fact that talk is especially imitated, those words are fitting which one might also use in speeches, and the ordinary, metaphor, and ornament are of this sort. Concerning tragedy, then, and imitation in action, let what has been said be sufficient for us.

23.

In regard to the arts of narration and imitation in meter, it is clear that one ought to put together the stories just as one does in tragedies, so that in being dramatic, with a beginning, middle, and end concerned with one whole and complete action, they may make the proper pleasure just as one whole animal does.¹⁶⁹ And the puttings-together

¹⁶⁷ They use the pronoun nin instead of the more ordinary auton.

¹⁶⁸ See Rhetoric 1412a11-15 in Appendix 3 below.

¹⁶⁹ Compare Plato's Phaedrus (264c2-5): "But I suspect that you would say this, every logos ought to be put together like an ani-should not be like histories, in which there is a necessity not to reveal a single action but rather a single time, everything that happened in that time about one or several people, each part of which relates to one another in a haphazard way. For just as the sea battle at Salamis and the battle against the Carthaginians in Sicily came to be at the same times, although not inclining to the same end, so also in successive times, one of the two comes to be after one of the two,¹⁷⁰ out of which not one single end comes to be. But pretty nearly most of the poets do [drôsi] this.¹⁷¹ Therefore, as we said already, also in this respect Homer would appear "to speak in a divine way"¹⁷² in comparison to everyone else in not even attempting to make the war a whole, although mal, with a kind of body of its own, so as to be neither headless nor footless, but to have a middle and extremities that have been written in a way that suit one another and the whole."

25

30

¹⁷⁰ Under other circumstances one might translate thateron meta thateron as "one after the other," but here Aristotle has coupled the two in speech contrary to the expressed purpose of the sentence. The phrase thateron meta thateron implies that two "others" have been paired. The expression occurs only here in Aristotle, never in Plato.

¹⁷¹ See Pindar's Pythian 1.71-80, where he links Hieron's victory over the Carthaginians and Etruscans with the battles at Salamis and Plataea through the notion of Greek freedom. He prepares for this by linking the barbarian with the monstrous, and the monstrous in turn with hatred of the Muses, who stand for Greekness.

¹⁷² "To speak in a divine way" translates thespesios. The word is common in Homer, where it occurs thirty-five times, but it is rare in Aristotle, where it occurs only twice (the other time in a quotation). In Plato it occurs five times, always either in a quotation or meant ironically. Here Aristotle seems to use it to praise Homer Homericly.

it had a beginning and end. For the story would otherwise have tended to be much too great and not easily seen at one time, or, if moderated in size, of a complex weave in its variety. But, as it stands, while he cut off one part, he used many episodes of its parts and he divides up the poiêsis with different episodes, for example, the catalogue of ships.¹⁷³ But everyone else makes many-parted poems about one man, one time, and one action, for example the poet who made the Cypria and the Little Iliad. For this very reason, from the Iliad and the Odyssey one tragedy is made from each, or only two, but from the Cypria many are made and from the Little Iliad more than eight, for example, The Judgment of Arms, Philoctetes, Neoptolemus, Eurypylos, Begging, Laconian Women, Sack of Ilium and Sailing Away, as well as Sinon and The Trojan Women.¹⁷⁴

35

1459b

5

¹⁷³ Vahlen cites the Scholiast on Odyssey 1.284: "Since the Odyssey does not admit of itself an adequate complexity, he makes Telemachus go to Sparta and Pylos in order that many Trojan matters might be stated by way of digression through Nestor and Menelaus, and now too one must state that the poet has made the hypothesis itself of a complexity of speeches and variation of forms in order that the tenor of the poem may not be uniform."

¹⁷⁴ In Proclus' Chrestomathy there is this summary of the Little Iliad, from which one can see how closely Aristotle followed its episodes: "Next there are four books of the Little Iliad by Lesches of Mytilene; they comprise the following: the judgment of arms occurs, and Odysseus gets them in accordance with Athena's wish, Ajax goes mad, maltreats the booty of the Achaeans, and kills himself; after this Odysseus waylays Helenus and, when he has prophesied about Troy's capture, Diomedes brings back Philoctetes from Lemnos. Philoctetes is cured by Machaon and in single combat kills Alexander; and after his corpse has been mutilated by Menelaus the Trojans pick it up and bury it; after this Deiphobus marries Helen. Odysseus brings Neoptolemus from Scyros and gives him the arms of his father; and Achilles' in tragedies, the irrational [alogon] is still more possible in epic poetry, and the wondrous is most of all a consequence of the irrational because we are not looking at the doer. Were the things concerning the pursuit of Hector on the stage, they would appear laughable – men standing and not pursuing while one man signals, shaking his head – but in epic it is not noticed.¹⁷⁶ The wondrous is pleasant, and the sign of this is that in reporting everyone adds things as if to be gratifying. Homer has been especially effective in teaching everyone else how they must speak falsehoods; this is the paralogism¹⁷⁷. For whenever on this being so, this is, or, on this becoming so, this becomes, then human beings believe if the later is, the earlier too is or becomes. But this is a falsehood. Therefore, if the first is a falsehood, but if when this is, it is necessary that something else be or become, then one has to add the second. For on account of knowing this to be true, our soul misreasons that the first is also. An example of this is from the Bath Scene. In short, impossible likelihoods should be preferred rather than possible implausibilities, and speeches should not be put together from irrational [alogôn] parts, but in the best possible case they ought to have nothing irrational, and if they do, it should be outside of the telling of the story¹⁷⁸ (like the failure of Oedipus to know how Laius was killed) and not in the drama (like the reports of the Pythian Games in Electra or like the arrival at Mysia of the mute from Tegea in the Mysians).¹⁷⁹ To say, then, that the story would be destroyed is laughable, for stories of this sort should not be put together to begin with. But if one does insert the irrational, and it appears rather reasonable, then the absurd too is possible since it would be clear that the irrational things in the Odyssey about his putting ashore would not be tolerable if an inferior poet were to make them. But, as it is, sweetening the absurd with all the other good things, the poet wipes it out. And one should elaborate the talk in the

English “character” covers both.

¹⁷⁶ “And just as in a dream one cannot catch up with the one in flight, and neither can one get away from the other nor the other catch up, so Achilles was not able to take him in his course any more than he could avoid him. And how else could Hektor have avoided the fate of his death had not Apollo met him for the very last time and up close stirred might in him to make his knees swift? Achilles gave a nod to his head to the army, and forbade them to shoot bitter death at Hector, lest someone hit him and win glory and he come in second.” (Iliad 22.199–207)

¹⁷⁷ Paralogismos was elsewhere (1455a13) translated by “misreasoning.”

30

35

1460b

¹⁷⁸ "Telling of the story" translates mitheuma; the word occurs first here in Greek and not again for two centuries.

¹⁷⁹ Compare Horace, Ars Poetica, 136-52: "Nor will you in this way begin as the cyclic writer once did: 'I shall sing of the fortune of Priam and the noble war.' How will he who promised this bring out anything worthy of such great bombast? Mountains will be pregnant; a ridiculous mouse will be born. How much more rightly does he do who does nothing ineptly: 'Tell me muse of the man who after the time of the capture of Troy saw the ways and cities of many men.' He does not think to produce smoke from flame, but light from smoke so that he might bring forth from smoke brilliant marvels: Antiphates, Scylla and Charybdis, along with the Cyclops. He does not begin the return of Diomedes from the death of Meleager nor the Trojan War from the twin egg. He always hastens to the event and carries the listener along into the middle of things just as if they were known. And those things that he despairs of being able to make shine if he treats them, he omits. And it is in this way that he lies. In this way he mixes falsehoods with truths, so that the middle is not out of line with the first thing, and the end is not out of line with the middle."

idle parts and in those concerned neither with character nor thought, for very excessively brilliant talk¹⁸⁰ removes from view both characters and thoughts.

5

25.

Concerning problems and solutions,¹⁸¹ it should become apparent by contemplating them in the following way both out of how many and out of what kinds they are. For, since the poet is an imitator, just as if he were a picture painter or some other maker of images, it is necessary that he always imitate some one of three things in number; for he must imitate either: 1. what sort it was or is, or 2. what sort they say it to be or it seems to be, or 3. what sort it should be. And these are reported in a talk in which there are foreign words, metaphors, and many modifications¹⁸² of talk. For we allow these things to the poets. In addition to this, the same rightness does not belong to the art of politics and poetics any more than to any other art and poetics. But there is a double mistake that belongs to poetics itself— one is in itself and the other is the accidental. If his choice was right, but he fell short in the imitation on account of incapacity, the mistake belongs to poetics itself; but if his choice was not right, and a horse has at once thrown both right legs forward at once, the mistake has occurred in a particular art, for example, in medicine or any other art whatsoever, and then it is not a mistake of poetics in ¹⁸⁰ This is an alliterative phrase — lian lampra lexis.

10

15

20

¹⁸¹ "Solution" translates huxis, previously rendered as "unraveling."

¹⁸² Pathos is translated as "modification" here; it is a technical rhetorical term. Elsewhere it has been translated in its more general sense of "suffering."

itself.¹⁸³ Hence one should solve¹⁸⁴ the problems the criticisms involve by looking at them on this basis. First, there are the criticisms directed against the art itself: "If it has made impossible things, it has made a mistake."¹⁸⁵ But it is right if it achieves its own end (for the end has been stated), if in this way it makes this or another part more astounding. The pursuit of Hector is an example. If, however, it was either more, or not less, possible for the end to exist even in accordance with the art about these things, then it has not rightly made a mistake. For it ought, if it is possible, generally to be without any mistakes. Further, to which of the two does the mistake belong? Is it according to art or according to something else accidental? For it is less if he did not know that a female deer does not have horns than if he depicted non-imitatively.¹⁸⁶ And besides this: if it is criticized because it is not true. But perhaps it is to be solved in this way: it is as it should be, for example, as Sophocles said he himself made men such as they should be while Euripides made men such as they are. But if in neither of these ways, it is to be solved in this way: "this is what they say," for example, the things about the gods; for perhaps it is neither better to speak in this way, nor is it true, but if it happened to be the case as it was for Xenophanes, still one

25

30

35

¹⁸³ There is a gap in the text in this sentence. We are translating Kassel's text with Vahlen's addition.

¹⁸⁴ The verb is luen, elsewhere translated as "unravel."

¹⁸⁵ We are translating Vahlen's emendation here.

¹⁸⁶ Aelian in his de natura animalium 7.39 cites several poets (Sophocles, Sophillus, Euripides, Pindar, Anacreon) who assigned horns to a female deer, and he goes on to remark that the grammarian Aristophanes of Byzantium weighed in on the side of the poets.

could say, "Well, they say, at any rate." And some things are perhaps not better but were so, such as what concerns arms: "Their spears [stood] erect on the butt end."¹⁸⁷ For they had this custom then just as the Illyrians do even now. Concerning whether something has been said or done by someone beautifully or not beautifully, one must not only consider whether it has stature or is inferior by looking at what has been done or said in itself, but also at the doer or speaker – in the presence of whom, or when, or in what way, or for the sake of what, for example whether in order that a greater good come to be or in order that a greater evil be absent. But some problems should be resolved by looking at the talk, for example, with respect to a foreign word, "first ourêas";¹⁸⁸ for perhaps he means not mules but guards. And with respect to Dolon, "he was surely bad in form [eidos],"¹⁸⁹ he means not that the body is ill-proportioned, but that the face [prosôpon] is ugly, for the Cretans call having a good face [euprosôpon] being well formed [eueides]. And by "mix it livelier,"¹⁹⁰ he means not "unmixed wine," as if for drunkards, but "more quickly." Or it has been said metaphorically, for example, "then all gods and men slept through the night," while at the same time he says "and yet when at the Trojan plain he gazed . . . the din of flutes and pipes."¹⁹¹ For "all" has been said metaphorically instead of

1461a

5

10

15

¹⁸⁷ Iliad 10.152.

¹⁸⁸ Iliad 1.50. The rest of the line speaks of Apollo's plague attacking dogs.

¹⁸⁹ Iliad 10.316. The rest of the line states that Dolon was swift-footed.

¹⁹⁰ Iliad 9.202. In the previous line Achilles had urged Patroclus to bring a larger mixing-bowl.

¹⁹¹ Aristotle seems to have confused Iliad 2.1–2, where Zeus is said

"many," for "all" is a "much." And "she alone has no part"¹⁹² is metaphorical, for the most known is the only one. And in terms of pitch variation, just as Hippias the Thasian solved "didomen to him to gain the boast"¹⁹³ and "the wood of which is rotted by rain."¹⁹⁴ And some are solved by division, for example Empedocles' "Quickly they grew mortal which previously had learned to be immortal, and pure previously to be mixed."¹⁹⁵ And some are solved by ambiguity: "pleiô two parts of night have past,"¹⁹⁶ for *pleiô*¹⁹⁷ is ambiguous. And some are solved by the habitual way of talking. They say, on the basis that a mixture [in the case of wine and water] is wine, there has been made a mixture of a to be awake with Iliad 10.1–16, where all the other Achaeans were asleep but Agamemnon was awake.

20

25

¹⁹² Iliad 18.489. This is from the shield Hephaestus made for Achilles; it refers to the constellation of the Big Dipper.

¹⁹³ Didomen with an accent on the first syllable means "we give" and with an accent on the second syllable is an infinitive with the force of the imperative, "give!" The reference seems to be to Iliad 2.15 where, however, we have a different text. Our source for this text is Aristotle's Sophistical Refutations 166b4–8: "and regarding the dream of Agamemnon, it is not that Zeus himself said 'we grant to him [didomen] to achieve his prayer' but Zeus was ordering the dream to give it."

¹⁹⁴ Replacing ou, or "not" by the aspirated hou or "of which" – see Iliad 23.328. For this and the previous problem compare Aristotle's Sophistical Refutations 166b1–9.

¹⁹⁵ "Previously" [prin] may govern either "pure" or "to be mixed." The reference is to Empedocles (fragment 35.14–15). Manuscripts of different authors cite the fragment in different ways.

¹⁹⁶ See Iliad 10.252 – the problem is that Homer goes on to indicate that a full third part is left.

¹⁹⁷ Pleiô means either "more than" or "full."

“greave of newly wrought tin,”¹⁹⁸ and on the basis that those who work iron are workers in bronze, Ganymede has been said to pour wine for Zeus,¹⁹⁹ although they do not drink wine. But this might also be metaphorical. When a word seems to signify a contradiction, one should look into how many ways it might signify in what has been said, for example, in “at this point the bronze spear was halted,”²⁰⁰
 how many ways it is possible for it to be hindered – how one might best understand it in this way or in that. This is opposed to what Glaucon says people do: “Some men irra-tionally have a preconception and then condemn what they themselves have concluded, and they criticize as if someone had spoken whatever they think is contrary to their own belief.” And the things concerning Icarius have suffered this. For they believe him to be Laconian; it is absurd then for Telemachus not to come upon him on his arrival at Lacedaemon. But perhaps it is as the Cephallenians claim; for they say that Odysseus married from among them and that the man was Icadus, not Icarus. So on account of the mistake it looks like a problem. In general, in relation to the poiêsis, one should bring back the impossible either to what is better or to opinion.²⁰¹ For in relation to the poiêsis, it is better to choose a persuasive impossibility than something unpersuasive and possible, and even if it is impossible for beings of this sort to be such as Zeuxis painted them, still it ¹⁹⁸ Iliad 21.592. Greaves were always made of a mixture of copper and tin.

¹⁹⁹ Iliad 20.234.

²⁰⁰ Iliad 20.272. The problem is that the spear is said to stop at the layer of the shield made of gold even though the golden layer, as ornamental, would certainly have been on the outside. Aristarchus and others thought the line to be interpolated.

²⁰¹ Others have understood there to be three possibilities here.

is better; for the model should exceed. The irrational ought to be brought back to what men say, both because they do so and because at times it is not irrational; for it is likely also that the contrary to the likely come to be.²⁰² One should look at things said in a contrary way, just as refutations do in speeches, to look at whether they are the same and in relation to the same thing and in a similar way so that it must be solved²⁰³ either in relation to what he says or to what the prudent man assumes. Criticism is right both of irrationality and of wickedness whenever without any necessity one uses the irrational, as Euripides used Aegeus,²⁰⁴ or one uses evil as in the Orestes Euripides used that of Menelaus. They bring criticisms, then, from five kinds – either as impossibilities, as irrationalities, as harms, as inconsistencies, or as against what is right according to an art. But solutions must be sought from the number of those mentioned. And there are twelve.

15

20

25

26.²⁰⁵

One might raise the question whether the imitation of epic poetry or tragic imitation is better. For if the less vulgar is better, and the one with a view to better spectators is always of this sort, it is very clear that the one leaving nothing ²⁰² This almost reproduces the quotation from Agathon cited at 1456a24 (chapter 18).

²⁰³ Reading huteon for antou with M. Schmidt.

²⁰⁴ In Euripides' Medea Aegeus is a character who comes in to offer Medea a place of refuge in Athens.

²⁰⁵ The problems and solutions of chapter 25 lead in this chapter to the posing of the question about the relative rank of tragedy and epic; the theme of the previous chapter was "Homer never nods."

unimitated is the vulgar. Just as if they do not get it unless 30 the performer on his own makes additions, they indulge in a great deal of movement as the inferior flautists do who, when playing the flute, roll around if they have to imitate the discus and, if they have to play Scylla, drag the leader of the chorus around. Now, tragedy is in fact of this sort, just as those earlier performers believed it of the later; for Mynniskus used to call Callipides an ape because he exag- 35 gerated so much, and there was this sort of opinion also about Pindar. But as these stand toward those, the whole art 1462a stands toward epic poetry. The one, they say exists with a view to sound spectators who require no gestures²⁰⁶ at all, but tragedy with a view to the inferior spectators. So if it is vulgar, it is clear that it would be worse. First, this charge is 5 not made against poetics but against the art of performing, since it is possible also for a rhapsode to be over elaborate with signs, as Sosistratus did, and as Mnasiheus the Opuntian did [epoiei] while singing. Second, neither is all movement to be rejected, unless indeed dancing is also to be rejected, but rather the movement that inferiors do.
 This was also what was criticized in Callipides and now in 10 others because they imitate unfree women. Third, tragedy, like epic poetry, does [poiei] its own thing even without movement, for it is apparent through reading what sort of thing it is. If, then, it is better in everything else, it is not necessary that this, at any rate, belong to it. It is better first because it has all the things that epic poetry has (for it is 15 possible even to use the meter of epic). Second, it has as no small part music and opseis, on account of which pleasures are constituted most vividly. Third, this vividness holds both in the reading and in the acting. Fourth, the ²⁰⁶ Once again, as at 1455a29 "gestures" translates schêmata, elsewhere translated as "characteristic shape."

purpose²⁰⁷ of its imitation is accomplished in a lesser length, for what is more concentrated is more pleasant than what is diluted in a long period of time – I mean [legô], for example, if someone were to put Sophocles' Oedipus into an epic of the length of the Iliad. Fifth, the imitation of the epic poets is less a one; and a sign of this is that . . . many tragedies come to be from any sort of epic imitation whatever, so that if they make one story, either it will appear cut short by being shown briefly²⁰⁸ or watered down by following the measured length. I mean [legô], for example, if it should be put together from many actions, just as the Iliad and the Odyssey have many parts of this sort which by themselves also have magnitude. And yet these poems have been put together to be the best they can be, and as far as possible are an imitation of one action. If, then, it is distinguished in all these respects and, further, in what the art is to do (for they should not make any chance pleasure but the one that has been said), it is apparent that it would be better were it to hit upon its end more than epic poetry does.

Concerning tragedy, then, and epic poetry – themselves, their kinds, and their parts – both how many they are and in what way they differ, and what the causes are of their being done well or not, and concerning criticisms and solutions, let so much have been said.²⁰⁹

²⁰⁷ Elsewhere telos is translated as "end."

²⁰⁸ The word is muouros; it means literally "mouse-tailed" and is usually applied to certain kinds of fish; in Rhetoric 1409b18 it is applied to periods. In the same place Aristotle uses budares, which we have translated as "watered down"; it is usually used of diluted wine. At Aeschylus's Agamemnon 798 it is used metaphorically of friendship; it is also applied to friendship at Politics 1262b15.

²⁰⁹ In the Florentine manuscript B, the Riccardianus, there follows a sentence of which only a few letters are legible, but it might have said: "But about lampoons and comedy I shall not write." If this was the remark of the scribe and not of Aristotle, it would imply that he had before him the whole or part of the second book, for in the catalogue that we have of Aristotle's writings, On Poetics is listed with two books.

Appendices

1. References to On Poetics in other texts of Aristotle¹

a. Aristotle Rhetoric 1.11, 1371b33: And likewise too since play and every relaxation is one of the pleasant things, and laughter is of the

¹ Compare also Proclus, On Plato's Republic 1:

We have to say second why exactly does Plato not accept tragedy and comedy, despite the fact that they contribute to the purification [aphosiōsis] of the passions, which it is neither possible to lock out entirely nor safe to satisfy, but they need a certain opportune motion, which on being satisfied in the hearing of these [tragedy and comedy] makes us not be bothered by them in the future . . . (Kroll, 42)

as well as:

And the second problem, which we shall solve in a way that agrees with what we said before, was the oddity of rejecting tragedy and comedy, if, that is, it is possible through them to satisfy the passions in a moderate way and, once they are satisfied, make them amenable to education by treatment of the distress they cause – it has at any rate offered Aristotle a great opportunity for blame as well as those who argued on behalf of the poets against the speeches of Plato . . . (Kroll, 49)

and:

We too shall say that the statesman must devise a certain disgorging of these passions, but not so as to enhance the passionate attachment to them, but rather, on the contrary, to bridle them and pull back on their motions in a harmonious way; but those sorts of poetry that in addition to complexity have the unmeasured in them from their provocation of these passions are far from useful for purification [aphosiōsis]. (Kroll, 50)

See also Iamblichus, On the Mysteries 1.11:

The powers of the human passions in us, if they are constrained on all sides, become more intense, but if they are brought forward for a brief activity [energeia] and up to the commensurate point are enjoyed in a measured way and satisfied, and then afterwards cleansed off by persuasion pleasant things, it is necessary that the laughable things too be pleasant – human beings, speeches, and deeds; and there has been a separate treatment about laughable things in On Poetics.

b. Rhetoric 3.18, 1419b2: And about the laughable things, since they are thought to have some use in debates, and Gorgias said rightly that one must destroy the seriousness of one's opponents by laughter, and their laughter by seriousness, it has been stated in On Poetics as to how many kinds of laughable things there are, some of which suit the free man, and some do not. Irony is more characteristic of a free man than buffoonery, for the former invents [makes] the laughable about himself, but the buffoon about another.²

c. Rhetoric 3.2, 1404b37: Of names, whereas homonyms are useful for the sophist (for he does damage on account of them), synonyms are for the poet. I mean names that are in common use and synonymous, for example, poreuesthai (to go) and badizein (to walk), for both of these are in common use and synonyms of one another. Now what each of them is and how many kinds of metaphor there are and that this has the most effect both in poetry and in speeches, that is, metaphors, has been stated in On Poetics in just the way we were speaking about it.

d. Simplicius in his commentary on Aristotle's Categories 36.13: For in fact Aristotle in On Poetics said that synonyms are of those things for which there are several names but the same account [logos], just as are "polynyms," lopion, bimation, and pharos [all words for cloak].

e. Antiatticist in Bekker's Anecdota 101.32: kuntaton (most shameless): Aristotle in On Poetics: "and the most shameless thing of all."³ and not violently, then they do come to rest. On account of this, when we observe the passions of others in comedy and tragedy, we put a check on our own, make them more moderate, and cleanse them off.

² See also Nicomachean Ethics 1.14 (1127b33-1128b9).

³ Since kuntaton has the root for dog (kuôn) in it, this quotation also occurred in the discussion of metaphor.

f. Aristotle Politics 8.7, 1341b32: And since we accept the division of songs as some of those engaged in philosophy divide them, when they set down some of them as ethical, some practical, and some enthusiastic, and they also arrange the nature of scales in relation to their suitability to each of them, different for different songs, and since we assert that one must not use music for the sake of a single benefit but for several (for it is for the sake of education and cleansing – and what we mean by cleansing, we will now speak of in an unqualified way, but again in On Poetics more clearly – and thirdly as a pastime, for relaxation and rest from toils), it is evident that one must use all the scales, but one must not use them all in the same manner, but the most ethical scales for education, and, when others are performing, for listening, [one must use] the practical and enthusiastic scales. For whatever experience occurs strongly in the case of some souls, it is there from the start in all souls, and it just differs by the less and more, for example, pity and fear, and further enthusiasm; for by this latter kind of motion some are possessed, and whenever they use the songs that excite the soul to a frenzy, we see them get into this state from sacred songs and obtain as it were a medical cure and cleansing. It is necessary that those liable to pity and those liable to fear, as well as those who are in general easily affected, experience⁴ this same thing, and everyone else does too to the extent that experiences of this sort befall each, and in the case of all a certain cleansing occurs and a lightening with pleasure. In the same way too cleansing [purificatory]⁵ songs provide a harmless joy to human beings.

g. Aristotle Politics 8.6, 1341a21: Furthermore the flute is not ethical but rather designed for exciting frenzy, so one must use it on [the flute] is cognate with the verb “to experience” or “to suffer to read ta melê ta praktika—songs of action.

those sorts of occasions in which contemplation [theôria] has a power to cleanse rather than to teach.

h. Aristotle Politics 8.5, 1340a5: [One has] to see as well whether at some point music pertains to character and the soul. This would be clear if we become of a certain sort through it. But that we do so become is evident through not only many other things but also through the songs of Olympus,⁶ for it is agreed that these songs make souls enthusiastic, and enthusiasm is an experience of character of the soul. And further, when they listen to imitations, all share in the same affect, even apart from rhythms and songs.

2. Aristotle On the Parts of Animals 644b22–645a30:

Of the beings, all that are by nature, some do not come into being or perish for all of time, and others partake of generation and corruption. It turns out that the contemplation of those beings that are estimable and divine is less available to us from the start (for the things that are evident to perception are absolutely very few on the basis of which one would investigate them and about which we long to know); but in regard to corruptible plants and animals, we are better equipped for knowing them on account of our living with them. If one should want to take sufficient trouble one would grasp many of the things that are there in the case of each genus. Each of the two has its charm. Even if we should get hold of little in the former case, all the same, on account of the high rank in the knowledge, it would be more pleasant than all the things in our midst, just as in the case of those loved it is more pleasant to catch a glimpse of some ordinary and small part of them than to see with precision many other great things; but, on the other hand, the things in our midst, because more of them are better known, have the advantage in point of scientific knowledge. Furthermore, because they are nearer to us and more akin to our own nature, there is a sort of compensation in that in comparison with the philosophy that deals with the divine things. Since we already went through them in speaking of what appears to us, it remains to speak of animal nature, without the omission of anything as far as possible and regardless of whether it is more or less estimable. For even among things that lack charm in point of our perception of them, all the same in point of contemplation the craftsmanship of nature affords indescribable pleasures to those who are able to know their causes and are philosophic by nature. For it would be against all reason and strange, if we enjoy contemplating their images because we contemplate simultaneously the craftsmanship of art (the art of painting or sculpture for example), but in the case of their composition by nature we should not welcome even more their contemplation, provided that is we should be able to catch sight of their causes. Therefore one must not express disgust at the examination of the less estimable animals, for there is something wonderful in all natural things. It is just as Heraclitus is said to have said to strangers who wanted to meet him; when they approached and saw him warming himself at the stove they stopped; but he urged them to enter and have no fear, for he said, "Gods are also here." It is in just this way that one ought to approach the investigation of each of the animals, without any sign of abashment, on the grounds that in all of them there is something natural and beautiful. It is especially in the works of nature that there is nothing random but rather that which is for the sake of something. That which has been put together or has come into being for the sake of some end has occupied the place of the beautiful. If someone maintains that the contemplation of all other animals is not estimable, then one has to believe in the same way about oneself, for it is not possible to see without much disgust from what the race of human beings has been put together, for example, blood, flesh, bones, veins, and parts of this sort.

⁶ Two passages in Plato make clear what Aristotle means by enthusiasm, or literally “the state of having the gods within.” Alcibiades in the Symposium (215b8–c6), in confirming the truth of his likening Socrates to the satyr Marsyas, says: “Well, aren’t you a flute player? Yes you are, and far more amazing than he, inasmuch as he used to enchant human beings through instruments by the power from the mouth, and still even now everyone does it who plays his songs on the flute – for the songs which Olympus used to play on the flute were Marsyas’s, for he was his teacher – regardless of whether a good flute player or a poor flute girl plays them, these songs alone make for possession and reveal those who are in need of the gods and initiatory rites because they are divine.” In the Menos (317b4–c1), Socrates says the flute songs are Marsyas’s and Olympus’s, “and they alone move and reveal those who are in need of the gods; and further they alone are left, inasmuch as they are divine.”

3. Aristotle Rhetoric

1371b4–10:

Since to learn and to wonder are pleasant, it is necessary that the following sorts of things be pleasant too, e.g., the imitated, just as painting, sculpture, and poetics do, and everything that has been well imitated, even if what has been imitated is not pleasant, for one does not enjoy that, but rather there is a syllogism, "That's it!" and the result is that one learns something.

1382a20–1383a12:

It will be evident in the following what sorts of things and of whom men are afraid, and what their own state is when they are afraid. Let fear be a certain pain or disturbance from the imagination [phantasia] of a future evil, either destructive or painful. For men do not fear all evil things, for example, whether he will be unjust or slow, but all that signify great pains or corruptions, and these moreover if they appear not far off but appear near enough to be imminent. For men are not afraid of things that are very far off; all know that they will die, but because it is not near, they show absolutely no concern. So if fear is this, it is necessary that those things be fearful that appear to have a great power to corrupt or inflict injuries that lead to great pain. Accordingly even the signs of these are fearful, for the fearful appears near at hand, and this is what danger is, the approaching of the fearful.

Enmity and anger of those who have the power to do some harm are of this sort (for it is clear that they want to and have the power, and hence they are close to doing it), and injustice if it is with power, for the unjust is unjust by choice. And insulted virtue if it has the power (for it is clear that it always chooses to act whenever it is insulted, and now it has the power); and fear of those who have the power to do some harm; for it is a necessity that a man like that be at the ready; and since the many are subject and enslaved to profiteering and are cowardly in dangers, to be in the power of another is for the most part frightening, and hence those who have secret knowledge of someone's terrible deed are to be feared either as informers or deserters; and those who are able to do wrong are frightening to those who are capable of being wronged; for human beings do wrong for the most part whenever they have the power. And those who have been wronged or believe they are wronged; for they are always on the lookout for an opportunity. And those who have done wrong, if they have the power, are frightening, because they are afraid of retaliation; for the fearful has been presupposed to be of this sort. And those who are rivals for the same things, everything that it is not possible for both to have at the same time; for they are always at war with those of that sort. And those who are frightening to those who are stronger than themselves, for they would be more capable of harming them, if they can harm the stronger. And whomever the stronger fear, for the same reason. And those who have killed those stronger than themselves, and those who attack those weaker than themselves, for either they are already frightening or they are on the increase. And of those who have been wronged and are enemies or rivals, it is not those quick to anger and are outspoken who are to be feared, but the gentle, the ironic, and criminally inclined; for just as it is not obvious whether they are close to acting, so it is never plain that they are far off. All things that are frightening are more frightening when it is not possible to rectify the mistakes they make, but either it is absolutely impossible or it is not in their power but in the power of their opponents. And for whomever help is not available or it is not easy. So, to speak without qualification, all things are frightening if when they happen or are about to happen to others they are pitiable.

Now the greatest of frightening things and what men are afraid of are pretty nearly these; but now let us speak of what the disposition of men is when they are afraid. If fear accompanies an expectation that one will suffer some destructive experience, it is evident that no one who believes he would not suffer anything is afraid, any more than of those things which they believe they would not suffer or of those by whom they believe they would not suffer, or at that time when they believe they would not. It is necessary then that those who believe they would suffer something be afraid, and by those, of those things, and at that time. Neither those who are in great good fortune or believe they are believe they would suffer (therefore they are insolent, contemptuous, and rash, and wealth, strength, a great number of friends, and power make them of this sort), nor those who believe they have already suffered every terrible thing and are coldly indifferent to the future, just as those who have already been tortured on a plank; but there must subsist some hope of recovery, about which they are in distress. Here is a sign: Fear makes men capable of deliberation, yet no one deliberates about the hopeless. Hence one has to put them in that state, whenever it is better for them to be afraid, by saying that they are the sort to suffer (for even greater people suffered) and to show people of that sort suffering or having suffered, and by the sort they believed they would not, and those things which they believed they would not and at a time when they believed they would not.

1385b11–1386b7:

Let us speak of what sorts of things are pitiable and whom men pity, and in what state they themselves are. Let pity be a pain for an apparent evil, either destructive or painful, that befalls someone who does not deserve it, which either he too would expect to suffer or would expect one of his own to suffer, and this when it appears near at hand. It is clear that it is necessary that he who is going to pity must be from the start the sort as to believe he would suffer some evil, either himself or one of his own, and the evil be of the sort that has been stated in the definition, either like it or close to it; therefore neither those who are completely devastated pity (for they believe they would no longer suffer anything, for they have suffered), nor those who believe they are super-happy, but rather they are insolent; for if they believe all the goods are theirs, the good that consists in the impossibility of suffering any evil is obviously theirs as well, for this is one of the goods. Those who are of the sort to believe they would suffer are those who have already suffered and have escaped, and the elderly both because of their thoughtfulness and experience, and the weak, and those who are rather cowardly, and the educated; for they are able to calculate; and those who have parents or children or wives; for these are one's own and the aforementioned evils are the sort that they can suffer. And those who feel no affect of courage, such as anger or confidence (for these states do not take the future into consideration), nor those in a hubristic disposition (for they too do not consider they will suffer anything), but those who are between these, nor in turn are not very much afraid; for those who have been struck dumb in terror do not pity, because they are involved in their own experience; and if they believe any are good; for he who believes that no one is good will believe that everyone is deserving of evil. And in general whenever one is in a state as to recall the sorts of things that happened to himself or to one of his own, or expects that it happen to himself or one of his own.

Now it has been stated what condition they are in who pity; and it is clear from the definition what things they pity. Everything that is destructive if it is painful is pitiable, and everything annihilating, and as many evils with magnitude of which chance is the cause. Deaths and outrages to the body, ill-usage, old age, illnesses, starvation are painful and destructive, and of evils of which chance is the cause are lack of friends or the fewness of friends (therefore to be torn apart from one's friends and familiars is pitiable), ugliness, weakness, lameness, and the occurrence of some evil to whom it was fitting that there be some good from the start, and the frequent occurrence of these sorts of things, and the occurrence of some good when one has suffered, for example the goods sent from the great king of Persia to Diopceithes when he was already dead, or the fact that no good has happened or there is no possibility of enjoying the goods that did happen.

These things and those like them are what men pity; and they pity acquaintances, if they are not very close to them by ties of kinship (in their case their feelings are as if about their future selves; so the son of Amasis did not burst into tears when his son was being led to his death, as they say, but he did for a friend who was begging,⁷ for the latter is pitiable, the former terrible; for the terrible is different from the pitiable and has the capacity to drive out pity, and it is often useful for the contrary; for men no longer pity when the terrible is near to them); and they pity those who are alike in point of age, character, state, rank, and family; for in all these cases it appears that it would more belong to oneself than otherwise; for in general, in this case too one must assume that as many things as men fear for themselves, they pity when they happen to others. Since experiences that appear close at hand are pitiable, what happened ten thousand years ago or will happen ten thousand years in the future, men do not remember in the former case and do not expect in the latter, and so either in general do not pity or not in the same way, it is necessary that those who enhance their performance by gestures,⁸ voices, and dress, and in general by their acting be more pitiable (for they make the evil appear near at hand, setting it before one's eyes either as what is about to be or has just been; and events that just happened or are soon to happen are more pitiable). And more pitiable too because of this are the signs: the dress of those who have suffered and everything of the sort, their actions, their speeches, and everything else in which they are engaged while suffering, for example when they are already dying. And especially to be good while involved in events of this sort is pitiable; for all these things increase the pity because they make it appear close by, both because he does not deserve it and the evil appears right in front of one.

⁷ See Herodotus 3.14-15.

1405a34–b3:

And further, one should not make far-fetched metaphors but we should make metaphors from what is akin and of a like sort, and transfer them to the unnamed by way of giving them a name, so that once it is stated it is clear that it is akin, for example in the following well known enigma: "I saw a man welding bronze on a man with fire." For what happened [pathos] is nameless, but both involve some kind of attachment. He therefore said the application of the cupping instrument to be a welding.

1410b10–27:

Learning is pleasant for all, and names signify something, so that as many names as make us learn are most pleasant. Now foreign words [glôttai – words of another dialect] are unknown, but we know the names in use. Metaphor is especially effective in this regard. Whenever one calls old age stubble, it brings about learning and knowledge through the genus; for both are things that have faded and lost their bloom. Now the similes (images) of poets do the same; and if they do it well, they are clever and witty; for the simile is, as was said before, a metaphor that has an additional [word],⁹ therefore it is less pleasant, for it is longer and does not say, "That's it!" The soul accordingly does not go on a search in that case. It is necessary that those enthymemes be clever that give us swift understanding. Neither superficial enthymemes are well regarded (we mean by superficial what is plain to everyone and whatever do not require any seeking), nor as many as we fail to understand even after they have been spoken, but all those are well regarded either when recognition occurs as soon as they are spoken (even if there were no prior knowledge) or when understanding lags just a little behind. A sort of learning then occurs, but not in the other cases.

⁸ The word is schêmata.

1412a11–15:

It has been stated before that one must use metaphors from what is at hand and not obvious, just as in philosophy it is characteristic of the insightful to observe the like even in things that are very far apart, as Archytas did when he said that an arbiter and an altar are the same, for the wronged has recourse to both.

4. Pseudo-Aristotle Problemata

920a8–10:

Why is there no choral song in tragedy in the hypodorian or hypophrygian mode? Is it because it has no antistrophe? Rather, it is from the stage, for it is mimetic.¹⁰

⁹ Compare Longinus, On the Sublime 32.3 (=Aristotle fr. 131 Rose): "Aristotle and Theophrastus say that these expressions, "as it were," "just as if," "if one has to speak in this way," and "if one must speak rather daringly," soften bold metaphors; for the plea to be excused, they say, heals the venturous phrase.

¹⁰ Consider Pseudo-Plutarch, de musica 1136D: "Aristoxenus says that Sappho was the first to invent the Mixolydian mode, and it was from her

922b10–27:

Why do choruses in tragedy sing neither in the hypodorian nor hypophrygian mode? Is it because these scales least admit of song, which a chorus most needs? The hypophrygian has a practical character; therefore in the Geryon [of Nicomachus] the exodus and the arming-scene have been made in it, and the hypodorian has the magnificent and steadfast, and therefore is the scale most adapted to the lyre. Both of these are not suitable for a chorus, but they are more appropriate for those on the stage. For they are imitators of heroes, and the chieftains of the ancients were only heroes; but the peoples (armies) were human beings, of which the chorus is. Accordingly, the mournful and quiet character and song suit it, for they are characteristic of the human. All the other scales have this, but least of all the hypophrygian; for it is enthusiastic and bacchic. We do undergo something in conformity with the mournful scale; and the weak are more susceptible to it than the powerful; accordingly it suits choruses; on the other hand, we act in conformity with the hypodorian and the hypophrygian, which is not proper to a chothat the tragic poets learned it; they took it over at any rate and yoked it with the Dorian mode, since the Dorian renders the magnificent and dignified, and the Mixolydian suffering, and through the two of them tragedy has become a mixture," as well as Cleonides' isagoge harmonica 13 (p. 206 Jan): "Modulation occurs in the performance of a song whenever the modulation is from an expansive to a contracted or quiet character. The expansive character of a song is that through which magnificence and an elevated manliness of soul are indicated, as well as heroic actions and the experiences proper to heroes. Tragedy employs it most of all and makes use of everything that is connected with this kind. A contracted character is that through which the soul shrinks into humility and an unmanly disposition. A state of this sort fits erotic experiences, lamentations for the dead, expressions of pity and the like. A quiet character of song is that which a quietness of soul, a state of freedom, and peace accompany. Hymns, paeans, praises, counsels and the like suit it."

rus. For the chorus is a mourner who does not act, for it offers only goodwill to those in its presence.

5. Aristotle Politics

1340a14–b17:

Since it happens that music is one of the pleasant things, and virtue is concerned with right enjoyment and in rightly loving and hating, the young must plainly learn and get accustomed to nothing so much as right judgment and enjoyment of sound characters and noble actions. Likenesses of anger and gentleness in rhythms and songs are closest to genuine and true natures, and there are likenesses as well of manliness and moderation and all their opposites, and of all other states and dispositions of character (and this is plain from what we do, for we alter in our soul on hearing things of these sorts); and the getting used to things in their likenesses through pain and joy is close to having the same manner in point of truth. For example, if someone takes pleasure in contemplating an image for no other cause than the shape itself, it is necessary that the contemplation of the thing itself, whose image he contemplates, be pleasant for him. It turns out that in the case of all other perceptible things there is no basis for a likeness for characters, for example in the case of taste and touch, and in the case of sight just barely. (There are shapes of this sort, but they are little effective, and not everyone has a share in this sort of perception; and further they are not likenesses of characters, but rather the shapes and colors that occur are signs of characters, and these in turn are bodily impressions of the passions. It is not that there is not a difference also in the contemplation of these things, and the young must not contemplate the paintings of Pauson, but those of Polygnotus and any other painter or sculptor who depicts character). It is in songs just by themselves that there are imitations of characters. This is obvious. The nature of the scales (harmonies) is right from the start different, so that listeners are disposed in different ways and do not maintain the same way in regard to each of them, but to some scales they are disposed more mournfully and constrainedly, for example, to the so-called mixolydian, but to others they are disposed more softly in their thought, for example to the unrestrained and relaxed scales, and they are disposed in a middle and composed way most in relation to another scale (of the scales only the Dorian is thought to do this), and the Phrygian is thought to induce "enthusiasm." Those who have philosophized about this education speak beautifully, for the witnesses they cite for their arguments are the deeds themselves. Rhythms too are in the same way. Some have a more stabilizing character, others stimulate, and of these some admit of more vulgar motions, others more befitting a free man. It is evident from this that music is capable of making the character of the soul be of a certain sort, and if it is capable it is plain that it must be applied to the young and they be educated in it. Instruction in music is fitting to a nature of this age; for the young do not willingly abide anything unpleasant, and music is by nature one of the sweeteners. There is a kinship of resemblance in scales and rhythms to the soul; accordingly, some of the wise say that the soul is a harmony, and others that it has a harmony.

6. Aristotle Nicomachean Ethics

1145a15-33:

After this we must make a new beginning and say that there are three species of character to be avoided, vice, lack of self-control, and bestiality. The contraries to two of them are clear; for we call one of them virtue and the other self-control; but in regard to bestiality it would be most appropriate to say of a virtue that is beyond us that it is something heroic and divine, just as Homer has made Priam say of Hector that he was exceedingly good, "He did not even seem to be the son of a man but rather of a god." Hence, if, as they say, gods come to be from human beings on account of surpassing virtue, it would be clear that the condition set in opposition to the bestial would be of this sort. For just as there is not even vice for a beast any more than a virtue, so there is none of a god, but the latter is more estimable than virtue, and the former a genus somewhat other than vice. Since it is rare that there be a divine man – the Spartans are accustomed to use this form of address whenever they admire someone very much (they say, seios anêr [divine man]) – so too the bestial is rare among human beings; but it especially occurs among barbarians, and some occur on account of illness and impairment; and we give an ill-omened name to those human beings who are surpassingly vicious.

1148b15–34:

Since some things are pleasant by nature, and of these some are so without qualification, and others depend on the types of animals and human beings, and others are not, but some become so on account of an impairment, others on account of habit, and still others on account of vicious natures, it is possible to observe in each case corresponding conditions. I am speaking of the bestial conditions, for example, the woman who split open pregnant women and ate their children, and of the sorts of things they say some of the savages in the Pontine region enjoy, for some enjoy raw meat and others human beings, and some lend their children to each another for the purpose of feasting, or what is reported about Phalaris. These conditions are bestial, but some arise on account of illnesses (to some too on account of madness, just as the one who sacrificed and ate his mother, and he who ate the liver of his fellow-slave), but other conditions are sickly or from habit, for example the plucking at the hair or nibbling on fingernails, and further the eating of ash and earth, and besides these sexual intercourse with males, for though in some cases it happens by nature, still in others it is from habit, because they were outraged from childhood. Now in the case of those where nature is responsible no one would say of them that they lacked self-control, just as one would not say it of women because they do not cover but are covered; and likewise in the case of all who are sickly on account of habit.

Index of Proper Names and Titles¹

- Achilles: 54b14; 59a1
Aegeus: 61b21
Aegisthus: 53a37
Aeschylus: 49a16; 56a17; 58b20, 22
Agathon: 51b21; *54b14; 56a18,
24, 30
Ajax: 56a1
Alcibiades: 51b11
Alcinous: 55a2
Alcmeon: of Astydamos, 53a20,
53b24, 33
Amphiaraus: of Carcinus, 55a27
Antheus: of Agathon, 51b21
Antigone: of Sophocles, 54a1
Ares: 57b21, 22, 32
Argos: 52a8
Ariphrades: 58b31
Aristophanes: 48a27
Astydamos: 53b33
Athenians: 48a36, b1
Athens: 49b7
Aulis: 54a32
Callipides: 61b35; 62a9
Carcinus: 54b23; 55a26
Carthaginians: 59a26
Centaur: of Chaeremon, 47b21
Cephalenians: 61b6
Chaeremon: 47b21; 60a2
Chionides: 48a34
Choephoroe: of Aeschylus, 55a4
Cleoboule: riddle of, 58a29
Cleon: 57a28
Cleophon: 48a12; 58a20
Clytaemestra: 53b23
Crates: 49b7
Cresphontes: of Euripides, 54a5
Cretans: 61a14
Cyclops: of Timotheus and Philoxenus, 48a15
Cypria: 59b2, 4
Cyprians: of Dicaeogenes, 55a1;
57b6
Danaus: 52a28
Deilias: 48a13

¹ An asterisk indicates a doubtful reading; a plus sign indicates that the name occurs more than once in the same context. Only the last two numbers of the Bekker pagination are cited (e.g., 47a rather than 1447a). Line numbers refer to the Greek text; accordingly they may vary as much as several lines in the English translation.

- Dicaeogenes: 55a1
 Dionysius: 48a6
 Dionysus: 57b21, 22
 Dolon: 61a12
 Dorians: 48a30
- Earthborn: 54b22
Electra: of Sophocles, 60a31
 Empedocles: 47b18; 57b13–14,
 24; 58a5; 61a24
 Epichares: 58b9
 Epicharmus: 48a33; *49b6
 Eriphyle: 53b24
 Euclides: 58b7
 Euripides: 53a24, 29, b28; 55b9;
 56a17, 27; 58b20; 58b24;
 60b34; 61b20
 *Eurypylus: 59b6
- Ganymede: 61a30
 Glaucou: 61b1
- Hades: 56a3
 Haemon: 54a2
 Hegemon: 48a12
Helle: of unknown poet, 54a8
Heracleid: 51a20
 Heracles: 51a22
 Hermocæixanthus: 57a35
 Herodotus: 51b2
 Hippias: 61a22
 Homer: 47b18; 48a11, 22, 26,
 b28, 29, 34; 51a23; 54b15;
 59a31; b12; 60a5, 19
- Icadius: 61b8
- Icarius: 61b4, 8
Iliad: 48b38; 51a29; 54b2; 56a13;
 56b16; 57a29, 35; 57b11; 58a7;
 58b31; 59b3, 14; 60a5, 15;
 61a2, 10–33; 62b3, 8, 26
Little Iliad: 59b2, 5
 Ilium: 56a16; *59b6
 Illyrians: 61a4
 Iphigeneia: 55a7
Iphigeneia in Aulis: of Euripides,
 54a32
Iphigeneia among the Taurians: of Euripides 52b5–8, 54a7;
 54a31–35; 55a18; 55b3–12
 Ixion: 56a1
- Laius: 60a30
 Lacedaemon: 61b6
 Laconian Women*: 59b6
Lynceus: 52a27
Lynceus: of Theodectes, 55b29
- Magnes: 48a34
 Marathon: 58b9
Margites: of Homer, 48b30, 38
 Massiliots: 57a35
Medea: of Euripides, 53b29; 54b1;
 61b21
 Megarians: 48a31
Melanippe the Wise?: of Euripides,
 54a31
 Meleager: 53a20
 Menelaus: 54a29; 61b21
 Merope: 54a5
 Mitys: 52a8, 9
 Mnasitheus: 62a7

- Mynniscus: 61b34
 Mysia: 60a32
Mysians: of Aeschylus, 60a32

 *Neoptolemus: 59b6
 Nicochares: 48a13
 Niobe: 56a17
Niptra: title of part of Odyssey,
 54b30; 60a26

 Odysseus: 54a30; 54b26; 57b11;
 61b7
Odysseus: Wounded, of Sophocles,
 53b34 Odysseus: False Messenger, of unknown poet, 55a14
Odyssey: 49a1; 51a24, 29; 53a32;
 54b26+; 55a2; 55b17; 57b10;
 58b25; 59b3, 15; 60a26, 35;
 62b9
 Oedipus: 53a11, 20
Oedipus: Tyrannus of Sophocles, 52a24; 53b31; 55a18; 60a30; of Theodectes, 52a27; 53b7;
 54b8; 60a30; 62b2
 Orestes: 53a20, 37; 52b6; 53b24;
 54a29, b31; 55a5, 7, b14
Orestes: of Euripides, 61b21

 Pauson: 48a6
 Peloponnesus: 48a35
 Peleïades: 58a4
Philoctetes: *59b5; of Aeschylus,
 58b22
 Philoxenus: 48a15

Phineidae: of unknown poet,
 55a10
Phorcys: 56a2
Phthiotides: 56a1
 Pindar: 61b35
 Polygnotus: 48a5; 50a27
 Polyidus: 55a6, b10
 *Poseidon: 55b8
 Prometheus: 56a2
 Protagoras: 56b15
 Pythia: 60a31

 Salamis: 59a25
Scylla: of Timotheus, 54a31;
 61b32
 Sinon*: 59b7
 Sisyphus: 56a22
 Sophocles: 48a26; 49a19; 53b31;
 54b8, 36; 55a18; 56a27; 60b33;
 62b3
 Socrates: 47b11
 Sosistratus: 62a7
 Sophron: mimes of, 47b10
 Sthenelus: 58a21

 Tegea: 60a32
 Telegonus: 53b33
 Telemachus: 61b5
 Telephus: 53a21
Tereus: of Sophocles, 54b36
 Theodectes: 55a9, b29
 Theodorus: 57a13
Theseid: 51a20
 Thyestes: 53a11, 21

Thyestes: of Carcinus, 54b23

Timotheus: 48a15

Trojan Women*: 59b7

Tydeus: of Theodectes, 55a9

Tyro: of Sophocles, 54b25

Xenarchus: 47b10

Xenophanes: 61a1

Word Index¹

- Account (logos): 49a9, 54b18, 55a34, 55b1, 17; See also Mean,
Say, Speak, and Speech
- Act, acting (prattein): 48a1, 23,
27, 48b1, 49b31, 37, 50a6, 21,
50b4, 52a36, 55a25, 59a15,
59b24; see also Do (prattein)
51a32, 51b11
- Action, acting (praxis, praktikon):
47a28, 48b25, 49b24, 36, 50a1,
2, 4, 16, 18, 50b3, 24, 51a18,
19, 28, 31, 51b29, 33, 52a2,
13, 14, 37, 53b16, 27, 54a18,
59a19, 22, 59b1, 60a1, 62b11;
see also Being in action
- Ambiguity, ambiguous
(amphibolia, amphibolon): 61a25,
26
- Analogy (analogon): 48b38, 57b9,
16, 57b25
- Anapest (anapaistos): 52b24
- Anger, angry (orgê, orgizesthai):
55a32, 56b1; see also irascible
- Animal (zôion): 48b7, 50b34, 38,
51a3, 4, 59a20
- Architectonic (architektonikê):
56b11
- Art (technê): 47a20, 21, 47b29,
50b20, 51a7, 24, 53a22, 54a10,
60b15, 19, 23, 28, 30, 61b24,
62a1, 62b12
- Artless, less artful, least artful
(atechnos): 50b17, 53b8, 54b20,
28, 31
- Astounding (ekplêktikos, ekplêxis):
54a4, 55a17, 60b25
- August (semnos): 48b25, 58a21
- Bad, badly (kakos, kakôs): 56a10,
18, 61a12; see also Evil, Vice,
Worse, and Wretchedness
- Barbarism (barbarismos): 58a24

¹ We have not differentiated the occurrences of words clustered under a single heading—e.g., “tragedy” and “tragic”—and have not indicated multiple occurrences on a single line. Only the last two numbers of the Bekker pagination are cited (e.g., 47a rather than 1447a). Line numbers refer to the Greek text; accordingly they may vary by as much as several lines in the English translation. The cluster of Greek words following each entry in parentheses correspond collectively but not necessarily individually to the cluster of English words constituting the entry.

- Beasts (thêria): 48b12, 56b24
- Beautiful, beautifully (kalos, kalôs):
47a10, 48b25, 50b1, 34, 37,
38, 51a11, 24, 52a10, 32,
52b31, 53a12, 19, 23, 54b11,
58b21, 59b12, 61a4
- Beginning (archê): 48a25, 48b22,
49a9, 49b1, 6, 50b26, 27,
55b26, 28, 57a3, 59a20, 32,
59b19, 60a33; see also First principle
- Being (ousia): 49b24
- Being in action (energountes):
48a23
- Belief (pistis): 54b28; see also Trust
- Best (aristos): 62b11; (beltiston):
55a16; see also Better, Good,
Strongest, and Useful
- Better (ameinôn): 53b3; (beltiôn):
48a4, 12, 18, 53a16, 33, 54a2,
54b9, 26, 30, 55a16, 60b36,
61a1, 61b10, 13, 26; (kreittôn):
48a6, 62b14, 63a13; see also
Strongest
- Body (sôma): 51a3, 54b24, 61a13
- Capacity (dunamis): 51b38; see also Impossible, Possible, and Power
- Cause (aitia, aitios): 48b4, 12, 19, 50a1, 51b16, 55b7, 62b18
- Chance (tuchê): 52a6, 54a11; see also Fortune
- Character (êthos, aêthê, êthikos):
47a28, 48a2, 3, 48b24, 49b38,
50a2, 5, 14, 20, 24, 25, 29,
50b8, 10, 54a16, 17, 27,
54b13, 59b9, 60a11, 60b5
- Chorus, choral (choros, chorikos):
49a17, 49b1, 50a24, 52b16, 19,
21, 22, 56a25
- City (polis): 49a12, 58a3; see also
Town
- Class (genos): 54a20; see also
Family and Genus
- Clear, clarity (saphêneia, saphês):
53b26, 58a18, 34, 58b1, 5
- Cognizance, cognizant (gignôskein): 53b28, 38
- Comedy, makers of comedy, comic singers (kômôidia, kômôïdopoioi, kômôidoi): 47a14,
47b27, 48a17, 30, 31, 37,
48b36, 49a2, 4, 10, 32, 38,
49b1, 22, 51b12, 53a36; see also Making fun of
- Communication (hêrmeneia):
50b14
- Compelled (anagkazesthai): 52a1,
54a12; see also Necessary
- Complete (teleios): 49b25, 50b24,
52a2, 59a19
- Connective (sundesmos): 56b21,
38, 57a29, 30
- Contemplate, contemplation
(theôrein, theôria): 48b11, 16,
50b38, 51a1, 2, 52a9, 55b2,
58b16, 59a8, 60b7; see also Observe and Theoretical understanding
- Contrivance (mêchanê): 54b1, 2

- Courageous (andreios): 56a23; see also Manly
- Dance, dancing, dancers (orchêsis, orchêstai, orchêstikon): 47a27, 48a9, 49a23, 60a1, 62a9
- Declamation (rhêsis): 50a29, 54a31, 56a31
- Definition (horos): 49b23; see also Limit
- Demes (dêmoi): 48a37
- Democracy (dêmoçratia): 48a32
- Depict (graphein): 60b32; see also Paint and Writings
- Deviation (ptôsis): 56b21, 57a18, 22
- Differ, difference (diaphora): 47b29, 48a8, 16, 19, 24, 48b2, 56b37
- Disprove (lucin): 56a38; see also Loosen, Solution, Unravel
- Dithyramb, art of making dithyrambs (dithurambos, dithurambopoiêtikê): 47a14, 47b26, 48a14, 49a11, 59a9
- Do (dran): 48a28, 29, 48b1, note to 49b26, 53a25, 53b22, 59a30, see also Drama; (poiein): 48b1, 48b8, 49b15, 52a26, 53a22, 53b18, 62b13, see also Engage in, Make, Produce, and Put; (prattein): 51b9, 11, 52a22, 53b30, 54a35, 60a14, 61a5, 6, 7, see also Act
- Double (diplous): 53a13, 31, 57a12, 32, 59a5, 9
- Drama, dramatic (drama, dramatikos, dramatopoiêsis): 48a28, 48b35, 37, 53b32, 54b3, 55b15, 56a15, 59a19, 60a31; see also Do
- Due measure (metron): 58b12; see also Meter
- Elegaic, elegaic poet (elegeia, elegeiopoios): 47b12, 14
- End (telos, teleutê, teleutan): 50a18, 22, 23, 50b26, 29, 33, 53a26, 32, 38, 55b29, 32, 57a7, 58a9, 14, 59a20, 27, 29, 32, 59b20, 60b24, 62b15; see also Purpose
- Enemy, enmity (echthra, echtbros, echthistos) 52a31, 53a37, 53b16, 17, 55b22
- Engage in (poiein): 51b38; see also Do, Make, Produce, and Put
- Enigma (ainigma): 58a24
- Entanglement (desis): 55b24, 25, 26, 30
- Epic, epic poetry, epic poet (epê, epopoiia, epopoiikon, epopoiios): 47a13, 47b14, 49a5, 49b9, 14, 16, 18, 55b16, 56a11, 12, 59b8, 16, 18, 60a13, 17, 61b26, 62a2, 12, 14, 62b3, 4, 15, 16
- Episode, episodic (epeisodion, epeisodioun, epeisodiôdês): 49a28, 51b31, 34, 52b16, 20, 55b1, 13, 23, 56a31, 59a35, 36, 59b30
- Event (pragma): 50a5, 15, 22, 32,

- 37, 50b22, 35, 51a10, 33,
51b22, 53b2, 5, 13, 54a14, 34, 54b6, 55a17, 56a20, 56b2; see also Matter
- Evil (kakos): 61a9; see also Bad,
Vice, and Wretchedness
- Evil, evilness (ponêros, ponêria):
53a1, 54a28, 56a22, 61b21
- Example (paradeigma): 58a20, 60a26, 60b26; see also Model and Paradigm
- Exodus (exodos): 52b16, 21
- Experience (pathos, pathêma, paschein): 49b28, 53b6, 55a31;
see also Modification, Passion, and Suffer
- False, falsely (pseudos, pseudê)
60a19, 22, 23
- Family (genos): 47b8, 53a11,
54a10; see also Class and Genus
- Father (patêr): 53b20
- Fear, fearful (phobos, phoberos):
49b27, 52a2, 26, 52b1, 32,
53a1, 4, 5, 6, 53b1, 9, 12, 56b1
- First principle (archê): 50a38; see also Beginning
- Fit, fitting (harmottein): 48b31,
50b5, 54a22, 56a31, 57a3,
58b15, 59a9, 12, 59b32, 60a4;
see also Harmony and Intonation
- Flute (art of, playing, player)
(aulein, aulêsis, aulêtikê, aulêtês):
47a15, 24, 48a9, 61b31, 32
- Foreign (glôtta): 57b1, 4, 6,
58a22, 58b13, 59a5, 9, 59b35,
60b12, 61a10
- Form (eidos): 61a12; see also Kind and Species
- Form (idea): 49b8, 50b34, 56b3,
58a26, 58b18
- Fortune (good, ill, mis-) (atuchia,
atuchein, eutuchia, eutuchein, dustuchia, dustuchein): 51a13,
52a31, 32, 52b2, 35, 37, 53a2,
4, 10, 14, 25, 55b28; see also
Chance
- Friend, friendship (philos, philia):
52a31, 53a38, 53b15, 19, 31
- General (katholou): 49b8, 50b12,
51b7, 55b1, 2, 8
- Genus (genos): 57b8; see also Class and Family
- God, goddess (theos): 54b6, 55b5,
7, 60b35, 61a17; see also Speak in a divine way
- Good (agathos): 50a28, 51b37,
54b9, 14, 56a6, 59b29, 60b2,
61a8; (chrêstos): 54a17, 19, 20;
see also Best, Better, Strongest, and Useful
- Great (megethos): 56b1, 59a34; see also Magnitude
- Grow (phuein): 61a24
- Harmony (harmonia): 47a22, 48b20, 49b29; see also Fit and Intonation
- Hear, hearing (akouein, akroasis):
53b5, 6, 55a2, 59b22, 30

- Heroic (bêrôikon, bêrôion): 48b33, 59a10, 11, 59b33, 34, 60a3
- History, historian (historia, historikos): 51b1, 3, 59a21
- Human being (anthrôpos): 47b13, 48b6, 50a16, 54b4, 57a16, 21, 26, 30, 60a20
- Hymn (hymnos): 48b27
- Iamb, iambic (iambeion, iampos): 48b31, 33, 49a4, 21, 25, 26, 58b19, 59a10, 12, 59b37; see also Lampoon
- Ignorance, ignorant (agnoiein, agnoia): 49b5, 52a30, 53b30, 35, 54a2, 56b13, 59a4, 60a6
- Image, image painter, maker of images (eikôn, eikazein, apeikazein, eikonographos, eikonopoios): 47a19, 48a6, 48b11, 15, 50b3, 54b9, 60b9
- Imitate, Imitation, Imitative, Imitator, Non-imitatively (mimeisthai, mimêma, mimêsis, mimêtikê, mimêtikos, mimêtês, amimêtôs): 47a16, 17, 19, 22, 47b13, 15, 21, 29, 48a1, 7, 8, 16, 18, 24, 26, 28, 29, 48b3, 5, 7, 8, 9, 18, 20, 25, 35, 49a32, 49b10, 21, 24, 31, 36, 50a4, 16, 20, 50b3, 24, 51a30, 31, 51b28, 29, 52a2, 13, 52b1, 33, 53b12, 54a27, 54b8, 11, 59a12, 15, 17, 59b25, 33, 37, 60a8, 9, 60b8, 9, 17, 32, 61b26, 29, 31, 62a10, 62b1, 4, 11
- Impossible, impossibility (adunaton): 51b18, 58a27, 60a27, 60b23, 61b9, 11, 23; see also Possible
- Inferior (phaulos): 48a2, 26, 49a32, 51b36, 54a21, 60b1, 61a6, 61b30, 62a4, 9
- Intonation (harmonia): 49a28; see also Fit and Harmony
- Invective (psogos): 48b27, 37
- Irrascible (orgilos): 54b12; see also Anger
- Irrational, Irrationality, Irrationally (alogia, alogon): 54b6, 60a13, 28, 29, 36, 61b1, 14, 19, 20, 23
- Is to . . . as (echein homoiôs pros): 57b17, 20; see also Like and Similar
- Just, justice (dikaion, dikaiosunê): 47b19, 53a8, 56a7
- Kind (eidos): 47a8, 49a8, 49b26, 30, 50a13, 52b14, 25, 54b19, 55b32, 56a33, 56b9, 57a23, 31, 58b14, 59b8, 60b7, 61b22, 62b17; see also Form and Species
- Kinship with the human (philanthrôpos): 52b38, 53a2, 56a21
- Knowledge (gnôsis): 52a30, 56b13
- Known (gnôrimos): 51b20, 25, 61a21
- Kommos: 52b18, 24

- Lampoon, maker of lampoons
(iambizon, iambikê, iambopoiein, iambopoioi): 48b32, 49b8, 51b14, 58b9; see also Iamb
- Language (onomasia): 50b17; see also Name, Noun, and Word
- Laughable (gelaios): 48b37, 49a20, 34, 36, 51b25, 58b12, 14, 60a15, 33
- Law (nomos): 55b5; see also Nome
- Learning (manthanein): 48b13, 16
- Length (mêkos): 49b12, 51a5, 6, 56a14, 56b32, 59b17, 18, 62a18, 62b7
- Lengthy, lengthened, lengthening (epektasis, epektinesthai): 57b2, 35, 58a3, 12, 23, 58b2, 59b23
- Letter (stoicheion): 56b20
- Life (bios): 50a17, 57b23
- Like, alike (homoios, homoiôs): 48b14, 49b15, 50b2, 51b21, 54a1, 59a8, 21; see also Is to . . . as and Similar
- Likely, it is likely (eikos, eoike): 48b4, 29, 51a12, 19, 23, 28, 38, 51b9, 13, 31, 35, 52a9, 20, 24, 54a32, 34, 36, 55a7, 17, 18, 55b10, 56a24, 25, 56b4, 60a27, 61b9, 15
- Limit (horos): 51a6, 10, 15, 59b18; see also Definition
- Loathsome (miarôn): 52b36, 53b39, 54a3
- Look (oran): 55a27, 60a14, 61a10; see also See
- Loosen (luain): 53b23; see also Disprove, Solution, and Unravel
- Low (tapeinos): 58a18, 20, 32
- Madness, madman (mania, manikos): 55a33, 55b14
- Magnificence (megaloprepeia): 59b29
- Magnitude (megethos): 49a19, 49b25, 50b25, 26, 36, 37, 51a4, 11, 12, 15, 56a14, 59b23, 62b10; see also Great
- Make, make poetry, make up (poiein, poieisthai): 47a21, 47b14, 21, 48a13, 35, 48b27, 36, 49b6, 8, 50a30, 35, 50b7, 51a21, 25, 35, 51b15, 20, 22, 30, 36, 53a35, 53b28, 29, 54a1, 25, 54b13, 30, 55a20, 34, 55b10, 57a1, 5, 8, 57b2, 33, 58a7, 58b8, 19, 22, 59a21, 22, 32, 37, 59b27, 60b23, 34, 61a28, 62b6; see also Do (poiein), Engage in, Produce, and Put
- Maker (poiêtês): 51a28; see also Poet
- Making fun of (kômôidein): 58b32; see also Comedy
- Man (anêr): 52b34, 53a12, 58a29, 60a10, 61a17
- Mainly (andreios): 54a22, 23; see also Courageous
- Matter (pragma): 50b35, 51a10; see also Event
- Mean (legein): 49b34, 50a4,

- 50b13, 51b34, 55b2, 26,
56a12, 62b7; see also Account,
Say, Speak, and Speech
- Metaphor, metaphorical, make metaphor (metaphora, metaphorikos metapherein):
57b2, 6, 30, 58a22, 58b13, 17,
59a6, 8, 10, 14, 59b35, 60b12,
61a16, 31
- Meter, art of metrics, in meter (metron, metrikê, metrikos emmetra): 47a29, 47b8, 11, 13,
15, 17, 18, 20, 22, 25, 48b21,
31, 32, 49a21, 24, 25, 49b10,
11, 30, 35, 50b14, 51b1, 2, 3,
28, 56b34, 38, 58b16, 59a17,
59b18, 32, 33, 35, 37, 62a15,
62b7; see also Due measure
- Misreason, misreasoning (paralo- gizesthai, paralogismos): 55a13,
16, 60a25; see also Paralogism
- Mistake (hamartanein, hamartêma, hamartia): 49a34, 51a20,
53a10, 16, 24, 54b17, 35,
56b15, 60b15, 17, 19, 23, 30,
61b8
- Model (paradeigma): 54a28,
61b13; see also Example and Paradigm
- Modification (pathos): 60b12; see also Experience, Passion, and Suffer
- Mother (mêtêr): 52a26, 53b20,
21, 54a8
- Music (mousikê): 62a16
- Name (onoma, onomazein): 47b10,
14, 48a35, 51b13, 15, 20, 22,
52a30, 55b13, 58a6; see also
Language, Noun, and Word
- Narration, narrative (diêgêsis, diêgêmatikê): 56b11, 59a17,
59b26, 33, 36
- Nature, natural, naturally, good nature (phusis, pephuke, phusikos, phusiologos, euphuês, euphuia): 47a12, 47b16, 19,
48b5, 22, 49a4, 15, 24, 50a1,
50b28, 29, 51a10, 24, 55a31,
32, 56b23, 57a2, 5, 9, 59a7,
60a4; see also Grow
- Necessary, necessity (anagkaios, anagkê): 48a1, 49b32, 37, 50a7,
50b27, 30, 51a14, 27, 38,
51b9, 35, 52a10, 20, 24, 53a12,
53b15, 37, 54a29, 34, 54b16,
59a22, 60a23, 60b9, 61b19,
62a13; see also Compelled
- Nome (nomos): 47b26, 48a15; see also Law
- Noun (onoma): 57a10, 16, 19,
58a8; see also Language, Name,
Word
- Observe (theôrein): 58b16; see also Contemplate and Theoretical understanding
- Oddness (perittê): 59b36
- Opsis: 49b33, 50a10, 13, 50b16,
20, 53b1, 59b10, 62a16
- Order (taxis, tetagmena): 50b35, 37

- Ordered arrangement (kosmos): 49b33; see also Ornament
- Ordinary (kurion): 57b1, 58a19, 23, 34, 58b3, 18, 59a2, 14; see also Sovereign
- Ornament (kosmos): 57b2, 58a33, 59a14; see also Ordered arrangement
- Pain, painful (odunê, odunêra, per-iôdunia): 49a37, 52b12
- Paint, art of, painter, painting (graphê, graphikê, graphein, grapheus): 48a5, 50a26, 28, 50b1, 54b11, 55a2, 61b13; see also Depict and Writings
- Paradigm (paradeigma): 54b14; see also Example and Model
- Paralogism (paralogismos): 60a20; see also Misreason
- Parodus (parodos): 52b17
- Parody (parôidia): 48a13
- Part (meros): 47b28, 49b16, 50a8, 11, 34, 51a32, 33, 52b9, 14, 19, 20, 21, 25, 55b27, 33, 56a6, 14, 17, 37, 56b20, 25, 57a11, 15, 24, 27, 58a34, 58b12, 59a35, 59b10, 25, 60a28, 60b3, 26, 62a16, 62b9, 17; see also Proper part
- Passion (pathos): 56a38; see also Experience, Modification, and Suffer
- Performer, art of performing, things of performance (bupokritas, bupokritikê, bupokritika): 49a16, 49b5, 50b19, 51b37, 56a26, 56b10, 57a21, 59b26, 61b34, 62a5
- Persuasive, unpersuasive, implausible (pithanon, apithanon): 51b16, 55a30, 60a27, 61b11, 12
- Philosopher, more philosophic (philosophos, philosophôteros): 48b13, 51b5
- Piteous (oiktra): 53b14; see also Pity
- Pity, piteous, pitiable, pitiful (eleein, eleemos, eleos): 49b27, 52a3, 38, 52b32, 36, 53a1, 3, 5, 6, 53b1, 5, 12, 17, 56b1, 3; see also Piteous (oiktra)
- Pleasure, pleasant, (hêdonê, hêdu): 48b13, 18, 53a36, 53b11, 12, 59a21, 60a17, 62a16, 62b1, 13; see also Sweeten
- Poem (poiêma): 48b29, 51a21, 59b13, 28, 62b10
- Poet (poiêtês): 47b15, 19, 48a33, 48b33, 34, 49b3, 26, 50a37, 50b20, 51a20, 51b1, 27, 28, 30, 32, 36, 37, 53a18, 30, 34, 53b3, 13, 54b11, 31, 34, 56a5, 6, 57b34, 58b759a29, 60a6, 7, 60b1, 2, 8, 13; see also Maker
- Poetics (poiêtikê): 47a8, 48b4, 50b17, 54b16, 55a33, 56b14, 18, 60b14, 20, 62a5
- Poiêsis*: 47a10, 14, 48b23, 24, 26,

- 49a3, 23, 51b6, 10, 58a20, 59a37, 61b10, 11
- Politics, politically (politikê, politikôs): 50b6, 7, 60b14
- Possible (dunaton): 51a38, 51b16, 17, 55a29, 57b5, 60a27, 61b12; see also Capacity, Impossible, and Power
- Power (dunamis): 47a9, 25, 49b35, 50b15, 18; see also Capacity, Impossible, and Possible
- Produce (poiein): 48b18; see also Do, Engage in, Make, and Put
- Proper part (morion): 47a11, 48b21, 49a34, 49b26, 32, 51a35, 56a26; see also Part
- Prologue (prologos): 49b4, 52b16, 19
- Prudent man (phronimos): 61b18
- Purpose (telos): 62a18; see also End
- Put (poiein): 60a3; see also Do, Engage in, Make, and Produce
- Put together: (sugkeisthai): 57a25, 58a10, 62b8; (suntthesis): 49b35, 50a5, 58a28, 59a22; (sunistanai): 47a9, 50a37, 50b32, 35, 51a29, 32, 51b12, 52b28, 53b4, 55a22, 59a18, 59b14, 60a28, 34, 62a16, 62b10; (suntithesthai): 53a19, 57a2; (sustasis): 50a15, 32, 50b22, 52a18, 53b2, 54a14, 34, 59b17, 21, 60a3
- Reading (anaginôskein, anagnôsis): 62a12, 17
- Recognize, recognition (anagnôrizerein, anagnôrîsis, anagnôrîsmos): 50a34, 52a16, 17, 29, 32, 36, 52b5, 6, 10, 11, 53b31, 35, 54a3, 4, 6, 8, 54b19, 20, 27, 32, 55a3, 15, 16, 55b9, 21, 34, 59b11, 15
- Report, reporting (aggelia, apaggelia, exaggellesthai): 48a21, 49b11, 26, 54b5, 60a18, 31, 60b11
- Reversal (peripeteia): 50a34, 52a15, 17, 22, 33, 38, 52b9, 10, 54b29, 55b34, 56a19, 59b10
- Rhapsode, rhapsody (rhapsôidein, rhapsôidia): 47b22, 62a6
- Rhetoric, rhetorically (rhêtorikê, rhêtorikôs): 50b6, 8, 56a35
- Rhythm (rhuthmos): 47a22, 26, 27, 47b25, 48b21, 49b29
- Say (legein): 49b3, 50b5, 51b9, 54b3, 57b26; see also Account, Mean, Speak, and Speech
- Scene-painting (skênographia): 49a18
- See (horan): 48b10, 15, 51a24, 53b4, 54b6, 55a1, 10, 24; see also Look
- Shape (morphê): 48b12, 54b10
- Shudder (phrittein): 53b5
- Sign, signify, significant (sêmeion, sêmainein, sêmantikos): 48a35, 48b9, 49a25, 50a35, 52a30, 53a17, 54b21, 55a20, 26,

- 56a15, 57a1, 12, 13, 14, 29, 30,
59a7, 60a17, 61a32, 62a6,
62b4
- Similar, similarly, similitude
(homoiôs, homoiôs): 48a6, 12,
53a5, 6, 54a24, 54b10, 55a5,
57b26, 59b31; see also Is to . . .
as and Like
- Simple (haplos): 49b11, 51b33,
52a12, 14, 52b31, 53a13,
56a20, 57a31, 59b9, 14
- Sing, singing (aidein): 56a28, 29,
31, 56b16
- Solution, solve, resolve (lusis, luain, dialuein): 60b6, 22, 35,
61a10, 22; see also Disprove,
Loosen, and Unravel
- Song, song-making (melos, melopoiia): 47b25, 49b29, 31,
33, 35, 50a10, 14, 50b16,
52b21, 22, 23, 59b10
- Sophist (sophistês): 55a6
- Soul (psychê): 50a38, 57b14,
60a25
- Soul, guide the (psychagôgein, psychagôgikos): 50a33, 50b17
- Sound (epieikês): 52b34, 54b13,
62a2
- Sound (phônê): 56b22, 23, 24, 27, 28, 29, 30, 35, 57a1, 2, 10; see also Voice and Vowel
- Sovereign (kurion): 50b19; see also Ordinary
- Speak, speaker (legein, legôn):
49a26, 50a6, 50b7, 10, 51a37,
51b1, 54a35, 56b6, 7, 60a19,
61a7; see also Account, Mean,
Say, and Speech
- Speak in a divine way (thespesios):
59a30
- Species (eidos): 57b8, 58a34,
58b14; see also Form and Kind
- Spectators (theatai, theatra): 49a9,
53a34, 35, 55a29, 61b28, 62a2
- Speech (logos): 47a22, 29, 47b11,
48a11, 49a17, 49b8, 10, 25, 28,
50b10, 15, 54a18, 56a37,
56b21, 57a3, 6, 23, 59a13,
60a27, 61b16
- Stage (skênê): 52b18, 25, 53a27,
55a28, 59b25, 60a15
- Stasimon (stasimon): 52b17, 23
- Stature, with, of, or having (spoudaios, spoudazesthai): 48a2,
27, 48b34, 49b1, 10, 17, 24,
51b6, 61a6
- Story, telling of the story (muthos, mutheumatos): 47a9, 49b5, 9,
50a4, 22, 32, 34, 38, 50b32,
51a5, 16, 22, 31, 32, 51b13,
24, 27, 33, 34, 38, 52a11, 12,
13, 19, 37, 52b9, 29, 53a12,
18, 37, 53b4, 7, 22, 54a12, 14,
37, 54b1, 35, 55a22, 55b8,
56a8, 13, 28, 59a18, 60a29, 33,
62b6
- Strongest (kratiston): 54a4; see also (under Good) Better (kreittôn)
- Subsidy (chorêgia): 53b8
- Suffer, Suffering (pathos, pathêma, pathêtikon, paschein, apathes):
47a28, 51b11, 52b11, 53a22,

- 53b18, 20 54a13, 55b34, 59b9,
11, 14, 61b4; see also Experience, Modification, and Passion
- Sweeten (hêduncin, hêdusma):
49b25, 28, 50b16, 60b2; see also Pleasure
- Syllable (sullabê): 56b21, 34, 36,
58a2
- Talk, talking (lexis, lektikos, dialek- tos): 49a19, 23, 24, 26, 27,
49b33, 34, 50a9, 14, 29, 36,
50b13, 52b23, 55a22, 56a34,
56b8, 9, 20, 58a18, 58b6, 9,
59a3, 12, 59b12, 16, 60b3, 5,
11, 12, 61a10, 27
- Terrible, terrifying (deinos):
53a22, 53b14, 30, 54a24, 56b3
- Tetrameter (tetrametron): 49a21,
22, 59b37
- Theoretical understanding, understand theoretically
(theôria, theôrein, theôrêma):
56b9, 19, 34, 37; see also
Contemplate and Observe
- Thought (dianoêtikon, dianoia):
49b38, 50a6, 30, 50b4, 11,
56a34, 59b11, 16, 60b4, 5
- Time (chronos): 49b14, 50b39,
55b6, 57a11, 14, 18, 59a23, 25,
28, 59b1, 62b2
- Town (astu): 48a38; see also City
- Tragedian (tragôidos): 58b32
- Tragedy (tragôidia): 47a13, 47b27,
48a16, 30, 34, 49a2, 7, 15, 37,
49b9, 15, 17, 19, 22, 24, 32,
50a8, 9, 16, 23, 24, 30, 32, 34,
38, 51b15, 52b1, 19, 20, 21,
25, 29, 31, 53a19, 23, 35,
53b10, 11, 32, 54b7, 8, 55b24,
32, 56a7, 12, 29, 59a15, 59b3,
8, 22, 61b32, 62a11, 62b16
- Tragedy, producer of (tragôidodi- daskalos): 49a5
- Tragic, least tragic (tragikon, atragôidotaton): 52b37, 53a27,
30, 53b39, 56a21, 61b26, 62a3
- Trochee (trochaios): 52b24
- True, truly, truest (alêthês, alêthinôtata): 55a32, 58b19,
60a24, 60b33, 36
- Trust (pisteuein): 51b17; see also Belief
- Ugly (aischos, aischros): 49a34, 35,
36, 61a13
- Unjust (adikos): 56a2
- Unravel, unraveling (luein, luisis):
54a37, 55b24, 56a9, 10; see also Disprove, Loosen, and Solution
- Useful (chrêsimos): 59a20; see also Good (chrêstos)
- Variety (poikilia): 59a34
- Verb (rhêma): 56b21, 57a14, 19, 22
- Vice (kakia): 48a3, 49a33, 53a8;
see also Bad, Evil, and Wretchedness
- Virtue (aretê): 48a3, 53a8, 58a18